DEC 27 43

If Cupid's been somewhat unfair . . .
Then tempt him now with shining hair!

No other shampoo leaves hair so lustrous, and yet so easy to manage!

A HONEY OF A HAIR-DO for the girl with long, thick hair. The shining-smooth coronet roll is newer than braids—and the chignon, rolled low on the neck, is very flattering. Before styling, the hair was washed with Special Drene, which deserves the credit for the extra lustre and the alluring smoothness.

Only Special Drene reveals up to 33% more lustre than soap . . . yet leaves hair so easy to arrange, so alluringly smooth!

A girl's best bet for making a dent in the heart of that handsome male is glamorous hair . . . lovely, shining hair that sparkles and gleams with highlights!

So don't let soap or soap shampoos rob your hair of its natural lustre.

INSTEAD, USE SPECIAL DRENE! See the dramatic difference after your first shampoo . . . how gloriously it reveals all the lovely sparkling highlights, all the natural color brilliance of your hair!

And now that Special Drene contains a wonderful hair conditioner, it leaves hair far silkier, smoother and easier to arrange . . . right after shampooing.

EASIER TO COMB into smooth, shining neatness! If you haven't tried Drene lately, you'll be amazed!

And remember . . . Special Drene gets rid of all flaky dandruff the very first time you use it.

So for more alluring hair, insist on Special Drene with Hair Conditioner added. Or ask your beauty shop to use it!

Soap film dulls lustre—robs hair of glamour!

Avoid this beauty handicap! Switch to Special Drene. It never leaves any dulling film as all soaps and soap shampoos do.

That's why Special Drene reveals up to 33% more lustre!

Smiles are brighter when gums are firmer. Guard against "pink tooth brush"—use Ipana and massage.

YOU'RE WORKING on the home front—backing our heroes on the battle front. But when your day's stint is done—it's time for relaxation—for fun, for dates and romance.

Do you need beauty to win hearts? Not at all! Look at the popular girls about you. Few can claim real beauty. But they all know how to smile!

So let your smile be bright—warm hearts with its magic! But for that kind of a smile you need bright, sparkling teeth. And remember, sparkling teeth depend largely on firm, healthy gums.

Never ignore "pink tooth brush"!

If your tooth brush "shows pink," see your dentist. He may tell you that soft foods have denied your gums the exercise they need for health. And, like many dentists, he may suggest the "helpful stimulation of Ipana and massage."

For Ipana is designed not only to clean teeth but, with massage, to help make gums firmer. Let Ipana and massage help you to have firmer gums, brighter teeth, a lovelier, more attractive smile!

Your Country needs you in a vital job!

3,000,000 women are needed to serve on the home front—to release more men for wartime duties.

Jobs of every kind—in offices, stores and schools—as well as in defense plants—are war jobs now.

What can you do? More than you think!

If your finger can press a button, you can run an elevator or a packaging machine! If you can keep house, you've got ability that hotels and restaurants are looking for!

RIDING HIGH

Here's some merry musical nonsense, with Dorothy Lamour playing an ex-burlesque queen. Dottie carries her costume for this one around in her handbag—and it's not a very big handbag, either! Dick Powell plays the handsome hero, Victor Moore has his best part of the year, and Milt Britton and his band produce some nice tunes.

If you have money, you don't need to spend it. That's an old principle, neatly illustrated by the late John D. Rockefeller's habit of passing out dimes as tips. If anyone else tipped a waiter a dime he'd get a Mickey Finn in his demi-tasse, but John D. was a multimillionaire, so it was O.K. If you have a few thousand dollar bills tucked away in your dirndl, you won't need a mink coat or a diamond bracelet. Just flash one of the bills, and everyone will start asking you to dinner.

This valuable lesson should be taught to us all at an early age. Dick Powell, as Steve Baird, doesn't learn it until he meets "Doctor" Mortimer Slocum (Victor Moore). (Continued on page 10)

Penniless Steve Baird (Dick Powell) needs money to finance a silver mine. "Doctor" Mortimer Slocum (Vic Moore) gives him several $1,000 bills "to flaunt but not to spend!"

The scheme works, and Dick's friends, thinking he's rich, gladly invest in his scheme. Meanwhile, Vic is pursued by Tess (Cass Daley), owner of ranch where they're staying.

When Dick meets burlesque queen Ann Castle (Dottie Lamour) he falls like a ton of bricks. Trouble begins when law puts clamps on Vic, who counterfeited greenbacks!

As last resort Vic bets $20,000 "hot money" vs. Cass' rival's 20 grand on a wagon race. Insures victory by sawing axle of what he thinks is enemy's wagon. See pic for results!

MOVIE REVIEWS

Steve is so broke he's thinking of turning himself in to the salvage drive. He has a silver mine but no silver. He's sold a part interest in the mine to a nice old boy named Castle, and now he'd like to buy it back so he could go into the Army with a clear conscience. He'd like to even before he meets Castle's daughter, Ann (Dorothy Lamour), who is "resting" between burlesque engagements.

That's when Steve encounters Mortimer Slocum. The "Doctor," an amiable gentleman in a faded Prince Albert, kindly provides him with several thousand-dollar bills. "Don't spend them," he says. "Just show them to people." So Steve, somewhat mystified, shows them to his old college classmates who have been pretty condescending lately. They do the double take of all time and jump to the conclusion that the silver mine has started paying off. They shower him with checks for shares in the property, and Steve believes he can start the mine producing.

Ann arrives on the scene just then, and, looking over the checks and thousand-dollar bills, thinks Steve has been holding out on her father. He has the devil's own time explaining, but finally he gets her out in the moonlight and sings her a couple of songs, which fixes everything. In fact, the world has taken on a distinctly rosy glow, when Steve finds out that the bills he's been showing around so airily are only a reasonable facsimile of the stuff the government puts out. In a word, the "Doctor" is a counterfeiter.

It's quite a blow, particularly since the local sheriff, a dim-witted character called "Foggy" (Gil Lamb), has spotted Slocum. He has matched up his picture with the one on the "Wanted" posters, and the chase is on. But in order to arrest Slocum, Foggy must catch him in possession of the counterfeit money. And right now Steve, not Slocum, has it. The hand is quicker than the eye, and from here on practically nobody knows where the money is at any given time.

Meanwhile, Tess (Cass Daley), the lady owner of the dude ranch where they are staying, is pursuing Dr. Slocum with intentions that are all too honorable. He isn't interested—he's too busy playing Cupid, trying to find a way to help Steve get Ann, plus some real money. There is to be a "chuck wagon" race, as a climax to a local celebration, and Tess is scheduled to drive a wagon. When Slocum sees a sample of her driving, he's sure she'll win. He bets twenty thousand dollars (counterfeit) against her rival's twenty grand (government issue), and the race begins. Slocum has taken the precaution of sawing through the axle of the wagon which he thinks belongs to the rival, but he finds out too late that it's the one Tess is to drive. The result is a burlesque race to end all races.

Paramount seems to have a nice gay touch with its escapist comedies, and this one is especially recommended.—Par.

P. S.

This is the first time Milt Britton's zany band has been filmed, although they've been doing musical acts in vaudeville and night clubs for 12 years . . . For their movie debut they perform their hilarious rendition of the "Poet and Peasant Overture," which concludes with Gil Lamb crashing through a grand piano . . . Breakaway duplicates of a stageful of musical instruments, chairs and music stands were made for this scene. In one number, 25 violins and two full-sized grand piano props are smashed to smithereens . . . Near tragedy when one of Gil's opponents got hold of a solid chair by mistake and whopped him over the head with it . . . One of the largest scenic panorama backgrounds ever made was painted for an outdoor production number in "Riding High." It's an Arizona desert scene of sand, cacti and rock formations with the blue range of the Santa Ritas rising in the distance. Scene was painted in two sections, and the total length was 310 feet. It stands 30 feet high. Took artist, P. T., Blackburn, and his two assistants, only seven days to complete it . . . Only location trip was made to Tucson, Arizona. Only camera man and stunt men made the trip, however, and all the shooting necessary was done in a few days.

MADAME CURIE

Every once in a while a picture comes along which reminds us of the extraordinary advance Hollywood has made in the last 25 years. Back in the days of Keystone comedies, none would have believed that people would go to see a picture about the scientific discovery of radium. But people will go, and they'll find it as exciting as any serial.

"Madame Curie" as a story has tremendous dramatic tension. And you'll be carried away by the triumphant performances of Greer Garson as Marie Curie, and Walter Pidgeon as Pierre, her husband. Their long years of labor together have poignant overtones which will bring a lump to your throat. Eve Curie, their daughter, wrote the biography on which the picture is based, so every scene in it rings true.

Back in 1892, we find a young Parisian scientist named Pierre Curie, who is at the moment a very disturbed young man. He has promised to let a student share his laboratory, and now he has found to his consternation that the student is a girl. "Woman is the natural enemy of science," he tells his assistant, David (Robert Walker), forebodingly. "No true scientist should have anything to do with women."

But of course Marie Sklodovska is not an ordinary woman. She is first and foremost a scientist. Pierre soon changes his mind—and his heart. In less than a year he and Marie are married. Marie is working for her doctor's degree, and the subject of her work is the strange radiation given off by pitch-blende. None knows its cause, and Marie is determined to find out. After a few experiments, she and Pierre realize that she has stumbled on an entirely new element. They decide to call it radium, and they devote the next five years of their lives to trying to isolate it. At the end of that time all they have to show for their heroic, almost unbelievable labor, is a faint, luminous stain on a saucer in the dark. They have found radium, but their task has only begun. . . .

Few of us are given the courage, persistence and devotion of Marie and Pierre Curie. But seeing this magnificent story come alive on the screen is an inspiration to us all.

Pierre's father and mother, as played by Henry Travers and Dame May Whitty, contribute much to the picture.—M-G-M.

every wife should understand

Safe new way in feminine hygiene gives continuous action for hours!

● Your happiness—your very health—can depend on whether or not you know the real facts about the vital problem of feminine hygiene!

Many women, who think they know, depend on out-dated or dangerous information . . . make the mistake of relying on weak, ineffective "home-made" mixtures . . . or risk using over-strong solutions of acids which can burn and injure delicate tissues.

Today modern, well-informed women everywhere have turned to Zonitors—the new, safe, convenient way in feminine hygiene.

Zonitors are dainty, snow-white suppositories which spread a greaseless, protective coating . . . and kill germs instantly at contact. Deodorize—not by temporarily masking—but by destroying odors. Cleanse antiseptically and give continuous medication for hours.

Yet Zonitors are safe for delicate tissues. Powerful—yet non-poisonous, non-caustic. Even help promote gentle healing. No apparatus; nothing to mix. At all druggists.

Zonitors ~ SO CONVENIENT

Greer Garson and Walter Pidgeon went over the script together, added several simple, everyday things to give their characterizations warmth, exchanged ideas about what the Curies must have been like . . . James Hilton, author of "Random Harvest" and other best sellers, was narrator for some of the sequences in the film. Has a very distinctive, unusual voice . . . Bob Walker gets another acting plum as second male lead, approached his first scenes slightly tongue-tied. Was completely thawed out in no time by that special Garson charm . . . Walter Pidgeon's shoes got an "extra" a job. When the man had to have another pair to get a speaking part as a waiter, Walter loaned him a pair of his 13 triple C's.

CROSS OF LORRAINE

This is type casting at its best. M-G-M has given Jean Pierre Aumont the part of a sergeant in the French Army. Jean Pierre was a sergeant in the French Army, so he is very good at it indeed. In fact, he's even better than he was in "Assignment in Brittany," and you remember how he won your heart in that.

He plays a soldier named Paul. Paul is a brave man, but he is too reasonable to be a good fighter—he sees both sides of everything. When Marshal Petain decrees an armistice, Paul persuades his companions to lay down their arms. The Germans have promised to send them back to rebuild their homes—surely that is better than to be dead heroes! Victor doesn't agree with him. Victor (Gene Kelly) doesn't trust German promises. They find how right he is when they are tricked into going to a concentration camp instead of back to France. After that, Paul comes to hate the Germans with a feeling that is as deep and perhaps more bitter than Victor's. He has gotten his comrades into this—some way he will get them out.

Meanwhile they are subjected to the constant brutality and sadism of the German sergeant, Breger (Peter Lorre). Not just physical cruelty, although there is plenty of that, but small mental tortures that are even worse. Things are made bearable only by the deep courage of a Catholic priest, Father Sebastian (Sir Cedric Hardwick), and by the devotion and skill of Dr. Francois Le Maire (Richard Whorf).

The plan which Paul finally evolves for their escape is so dangerous that it seems impossible it will work at all. But sometimes Nazi viciousness can be turned against itself—and Paul is a clever man. They do escape from the camp, but they are not free of Nazi power which holds their beloved France in a strangling net. Paul and Victor defy that power in a scene that will make you stand up and cheer.

This may be a propaganda picture, but you'll admit it's effective. The whole cast is magnificent, and includes, besides those already mentioned, Tonio Selwart, Joseph Calleia and Hume Cronyn.—M-G-M.

P. S.

This was Jean Pierre's last film before leaving for Africa to join the Fighting French Army. Spent his last day at the studio bidding good-by to pals, shaking hands all around, promising to send post-cards . . . Author Robert Aisner was the second member of the "Cross of Lorraine" company to enlist in the same Army. Aisner formerly was a lieutenant in the French Army, was captured during the German invasion and imprisoned in 1940. Screenplay of the picture was based on his experiences in the prison camp . . . Hume Cronyn was signed to a long term contract after M-G-M executives saw rushes of the first few days' work. Cronyn debuted in films as the timid armchair criminologist in "Shadow of a Doubt" . . . Richard Whorf held an exhibition of his paintings at a local art gallery, sold most of 'em right off the walls the first day . . . During production Jean Pierre and Maria Montez were married. Charles Boyer was best man, Jeannine Crispin, matron of honor . . . Gene Kelly is still head of a chain of Eastern dancing schools, started before he entered pictures and was better known for his hoofing than his acting . . . Kelly spent time between scenes teaching songs to Aumont, who in turn will sing them for his compatriots in the French Army.

THE MAN FROM DOWN UNDER

It's odd the way any picture in which Charles Laughton appears turns out to be strictly a Charles Laughton picture. The rest of the cast is apparently just there for background, like the scenery. There's no question about Laughton being a great actor, and when his role is sufficiently interesting, nobody minds his being in every scene. Fortunately, this is the case in "The Man from Down Under." "Jocko" Wilson is a fascinating character—you can't get too much of him.

It all begins at the end of World War I, with "Jocko" sailing from France back to his native Australia. He is gloriously drunk and has completely forgotten that he had a date to marry one Aggie Dawlins (Binnie Barnes) before he sailed. But he isn't so drunk that he forgot to smuggle a Remember the way it goes? Below there are 20 clues. On pgs. 65 and 77 there are two more sets of clues, and on page 92 are the answers. If you can guess, after mulling over the first clue, the name of the actor or actress to whom it refers, score yourself 5 points. If you must turn to the second set of clues before you get the answer, score yourself 4 points. And if you guess on the third try, the question's worth 3. For a perfect score, you'd have to guess all 20 questions on the first set of clues. 20 questions . . . at five points each . . . adds up to 100, and a shiny gold star for you. Simple, no? Go ahead, you quiz-ical brighties, and no cheating! 60's normal this time, 70's good, 88 or so is in our class this month, and anything over is strictly genius. couple of little Belgian orphans aboard ship. They are a boy and girl he found in a street fight, and they already adore "Jocko" with utter devotion.

Time marches on, in Australia as elsewhere, and the boy orphan grows into "Nipper" Wilson (Richard Carlson), contender for the Empire Boxing Championship, with "Jocko" as his manager. The girl, Mary (Donna Reed), whom "Nipper" believes to be his sister, has been away at an exclusive finishing school, but she comes home to see "Nipper" try for the championship. It's a tough fight, and when "Nipper" finally wins, he has injured his shoulder so that the doctors say he will never be able to box again.

"Jocko," who wagered every cent he could lay hands on, and some he couldn't, on "Nipper," has won enough to buy a hotel in the country. It's a fine hotel—it has everything but guests. When one finally does appear, complete with maid, chauffeur and limousine, she turns out to be Aggie Dawlins. Aggie is bent on revenge for the way "Jocko" left her waiting at the church. She wins the hotel away from him in a crap game, and about that same time "Nipper" walks out on the family. "Jocko" can take the first blow, but the second breaks his heart. He doesn't know that "Nipper" had to leave because he felt a most unbrotherly affection for Mary.

It takes World War II to iron out all these problems. The climax is wonderful—and undiluted Laughton.—M-G-M.

Last minute, Navy changed his orders, postponed his call.

GUNG HO

Remember the pictures in Life magazine a while ago of Colonel Carlson and his Marine raiders? Universal has made a picture based on their expedition, and it's a thriller-diller. The title, "Gung Ho," is Chinese for "work together," and that's the way the raiders do it.

Just the regular training a guy goes through to get to be a Marine is tough enough. But the training given the lads who are to be sent on a special commando-type mission—well, even Superman would

"Uniform" Hospitality

Let's all resolve to invite boys in service to share our holiday feasts.

Irene Manning, Warner Bros.' lovely new singing star, now appearing in "The Desert Song," is shown here entertaining Marine Neil Thomas, Seaman Waldo A. Rowell and soldier Dick McMullen at a turkey dinner.

When you prepare a poultry dinner for servicemen—whether you feature turkey, capon, goose or chicken—make success doubly certain by having plenty of flavorsome stuffing because the boys go for it in a big way!

So near and dear to every serviceman's heart is the subject of food that there are those who claim—and we think rightly—that where our boys in uniform are concerned, there is no more effective morale builder than a good, home-cooked meal!

This opinion is shared by Irene Manning, Warners' lovely new singing star. And Irene certainly ought to know. First off because she is a war time bride herself and has first-hand information on how her own serviceman feels about a dinner that features homemade specialties and that is served on a snowy tablecloth with gleaming silverware and all the trimmings! Secondly, Irene recently asked three boys from different branches of our armed services to share a big turkey dinner with her. "And you should have heard them rave and seen them eat," she told us with a reminiscent chuckle.

Fortunately a camera man was on hand to catch their pleased expressions so that you can actually see for yourself how delighted they were with the fine fare that Irene provided for their enjoyment. Of course we'd be the first to admit—having met Irene—that the charm and beauty of the hostess contributed greatly to the success of the occasion. But the home atmosphere and the home cooking also played star roles in this particular picture.

If you want to garner your share of appreciative smiles and heartfelt thanks, too, then make it one of your 1944 Good Resolutions to ask some of the lonely, homesick boys from nearby camps to your house for dinner, often—especially on holidays!

"But what about the necessary food points?" you may well ask. Well, Miss Manning has some suggestions to offer along those lines. First, she advises building your menu around poultry. Not necessarily turkey, either; because roast duck, goose, chicken or capon will also receive a hearty welcome from guests and family alike. That is, as Irene sagely remarked, if you also provide a liberal amount of rich brown gravy and plenty of tasty bread stuffing.

Irene further advises omitting the first course entirely in favor of a simple salad served right along with the main course. Team up now-plentiful white potatoes with turnips for the necessary vegetable accompaniment; or serve sweet potatoes with some other inexpensive fresh vegetable and your point score will be gratifyingly low!

End the meal with a Steamed Fig Pudding which gets its fine flavor from this flavorsome, non-rationed fruit and its unusual color from a most surprising source—as you'll discover when you study the recipe. Such a meal would be a festive one indeed—worthy of your best efforts and of your uniformed guests.

By the way if you ever have any questions you'd like to ask about recipes or rationing, be sure to drop us a postal or letter, and it will take but a short time for the Modern Screen envelope to reach you with our reply. For we realize that food is more important now than ever before, and we want to help you in every way we can to make the best possible use of today's often limited food supplies.

SAVORY STUFFING

For a 10-15-pound turkey plan on using two 1-pound loaves of enriched white bread. For a smaller bird make the necessary adjustments in all ingredients.

To make a dry stuffing—the kind that men really like best—you must have dry bread. This does not mean remembering to buy it a week ahead, however. Instead, simply spread out the slices of fresh bread on large baking sheets and place in warm oven to dry out. Then remove crusts and crumble the slices between your fingers. Or, if you prefer cubes, stack about 4 crustless slices together and cut into ½" strips, then cut crosswise into ½" cubes.

In a large skillet melt 1 cup shortening. We suggest using half vegetable shortening or other bland-flavored fat and half poultry fat which can be purchased without point penalties if you have none "saved up." Sauté 2 small minced onions and 1 cup chopped celery in the melted fat until soft but not brown. Add the prepared crumbs or cubes; also 1 teaspoon salt, ½ teaspoon pepper, 2 tablespoons chopped parsley and 1-2 teaspoons sage, marjoram or poultry seasoning. Toss all together, lightly. (A little of the liquid in which giblets and neck have cooked may be used to moisten the dressing. However the amount used—if any—should be small, as a soggy dressing is not desirable.) Pile the dressing into cavity in bird lightly—leaving room to expand during roasting. Sew up opening or lace together tightly with string wound around skewers placed across the vent. Use some of the stuffing to stuff the loose skin at the neck. And now you're ready to truss and roast the bird in the usual manner.

STEAMED FIG PUDDING

2 cups sifted enriched flour
2 teaspoons baking powder
½ teaspoon baking soda
1 teaspoon cinnamon
½ teaspoon nutmeg
1½ cups chopped figs
4 tablespoons shortening
1 cup sugar
1 egg, beaten
1 can condensed tomato soup

Sift flour with baking powder, soda and spices. Wash figs, dry, chop fine, sprinkle with 2 tablespoons of flour mixture. Cream shortening, add sugar gradually, creaming until light and fluffy. Add beaten egg, then the flour alternately with the soup. Stir until smooth. Fold in figs. Turn into a greased mold, filling it two-thirds full. Place on rack in steamer or deep kettle, over boiling water. (Water should not touch the pudding mold since it's the steam that does the cooking. More boiling water may be added, as needed, after the first hour of steaming.) Steam 2 hours. Serve with the following sauce. Serves 8.

PUDDING SAUCE: Mix ¼ cup sugar, 1 tablespoon flour and ¼ teaspoon salt. Add an egg which has been beaten with 1 tablespoon cold water. Beat with a fork until smooth. Slowly add ⅓ cup corn syrup blended with ⅔ cup boiling water. Cook in top of double boiler about 5 minutes—or until smooth and slightly thickened, stirring constantly. Remove from heat. Flavor with ¼ teaspoon vanilla or a couple of tablespoons of rum, brandy or sherry. Serve hot.

Many will recognize in "Steamed Fig Pudding" a worthy first cousin of the long famous "Tomato Soup Cake," now destined for a popular revival because it calls for only 2 tablespoons of shortening! If you would like to have a recipe for this unusual cake, FREE, just send your request—a postal card will do—to:

probably fold up about the third week.

Take the group that's training under Colonel Thorwald (Randolph Scott). They're so tough it scares you to watch them. They are still plenty human though—like the two half-brothers, Kurt Richter (Noah Beery, Jr.) and Larry O'Ryan (David Bruce) who are in love with the same girl. Kurt and Larry have fought all their lives, and now they are battling for Kathleen (Grace McDonald).

The day comes when they both have to tell her good-by. The Raiders move out on the first leg of their long journey. At Honolulu they board a submarine, and once in its cramped, narrow quarters, are told the object of their mission. They are to raid Makin Island, a fortified Jap position which threatens the Hawaiian Islands.

Afer a long, nerve-racking voyage in the crowded sub, they finally sight the black, palm-fringed outline of Makin Island. The moment for which they've been training all these weary months is at hand. Efficiently, silently, the Raiders make their landing. They are greeted by Jap snipers at every hand. You'll want to see that battle, not hear about it from me. When you do see it, you'll find yourself saying, "So that's how they do it." Because those scenes give you the real inside on guerrilla warfare.

A string of young actors has been assembled for this job. Sam Levene and Alan Curtis rate special mention.—Univ.

P. S.

Thirty U. S. Marine Raiders, including four survivors of Lieut. Col. Evans F. Carlson's original raiders of Jap-held Makin Island slightly over a year ago, checked in at Universal from Camp Pendleton to play their parts for this picture . . . Two complete companies of cameramen, extras and technicians were used, one at the San Diego Marine Base and one at Camp Pendleton, California . . . Location at Camp Pendleton was an exact replica of the beach at Makin Island . . . Studio crew and officials lived at a Guyule Camp and commuted to Pendleton every day, a trip of 130 miles.

PIN UP GIRL

To our armed forces, "pin up girl" is just a synonym for Betty Grable. Pictures of la Grable in a bathing suit have become practically standard GI equipment, and Twentieth Century-Fox has now dreamed up a movie to prove it—in Technicolor. It has pretty girls, pretty tunes and a pretty funny plot.

Betty plays a girl named Lorry Jones. Lorry's theory is that truth lacks glamour, so she dresses it up a bit here and there. You couldn't really call it lying—or could you? Lorry is the toast of the local USO, and all the boys take along pictures of her to wherever they're going. In fact, by the time she leaves home to take a typist job in Washington, she is engaged to—in round numbers—three hundred stalwart members of the U. S. Army. Not to mention a Marine named George.

Lorry and her girl friend, Kay (Dorothea Kent), stop in New York on their way to Washington. There they palm themselves off on the haughty Club Chartreuse by saying they are pals of the great Tommy Dooley (John Harvey), young war hero just back from Guadalcanal. As friends of Dooley they are greeted with champagne, corsages and perfume. "We're sitting pretty now," Lorry thinks. "Yeah," says Kay, "on a keg of dynamite."

It looks as if the girl has something there when Tommy Dooley arrives in person. Lorry's imagination starts working overtime again and gets them out of the frying pan—right into the fire. She tells Tommy she's a glamorous singer, and when he later follows her to Washington, he doesn't recognize her with glasses on, pounding a typewriter. Although the legs do look familiar! Pretty soon Lorry is working the day shift as a mousey typist, and the swing shift as a night club singer, and both ways, she's in love with Tommy 100 per cent. Complicated, but fun!

Martha Raye is wonderful as an entertainer who loves all the soldiers and sailors. You'll find Joe E. Brown and Eugene Pallette in the comedy department, too. Listen for an embryo Hit Parade tune called "Time Alone Will Tell."—20th-Fox.

P. S.

Betty Grable prefaced production of this one by her marriage to Harry James, one day before the picture started . . . Newcomer John Harvey was last seen emoting on Broadway in "Kiss and Tell" . . . Martha Raye and Joe E. Brown were kept busy between scenes introducing their visitors to Betty. Guests were servicemen Martha and Joe had met on their overseas entertainment tours . . . The Sonja Henie of the roller skates is 20-year-old Gloria Nord, who leads the Skating Vanities . . . Top song writers Mack Gordon and Jimmy Monaco teamed for first time to turn out seven numbers, among them: "You're My Little Pin Up Girl," "Time Alone Will Tell" and "Red Robins, Bob Whites and Blue Birds."

HANDS ACROSS THE BORDER

This one starts right out with Roy Rogers on a horse, but that's where it fools you. The horse isn't Trigger. In fact, Roy and Trigger don't get together till along in the second reel, but when they do it's love at first sight—naturally.

It's love at first sight, too, with Roy and Kim Adams (Ruth Terry)—at least on Roy's side. Kim's father is the genial, gambling rancher who owns Trigger. Mr. Adams is training horses in the hope of selling them to the U. S. Cavalry, but so is Brock Danvers (Onslow Stevens) who wants no competitors. So maybe it's an accident, and maybe it's not, that Brock urges Adams to ride the as-yet untrained Trigger. Maybe it's an accident that the saddle comes off and Adams is killed. Maybe—but Roy doesn't think so.

With Adams out of the way, Danvers concentrates on persuading Kim to sell him the ranch. Kim has been spending her winters as an actress in New York, and he urges her to go back to Broadway and forget the ranch. Bewildered and heartbroken by her father's tragic death, Kim is ready to agree. She is even ready to let Danvers shoot Trigger as a horse too dangerous to have around, but that's where Roy steps in. He spirits Trigger away, while Danvers fumes impotently, and goes to work to train the horse to do every trick under the sun. By the time he gets through, Trigger could star on Information Please.

During a Mexican fiesta, Roy sees Kim and points out that her family has never been the quitting kind, and that her father would want the ranch to stay in her hands. Roy can be pretty persuasive, especially when he backs his arguments up with songs by Hoagy Carmichael. It's no wonder that Kim changes her mind and decides to stay.

So Danvers has plenty of competition after all, in trying to sell horses to the U. S. Cavalry. The contracts are to be awarded on the basis of a cross-country race, complete with a simulated battle and gas attack. Wait till you see that race!

Bob Nolan and the Pioneers are around, and so are Guinn Williams, Mary Treen and Duncan Renaldo.—Rep.

P. S.

Roy has made nearly 50 pictures since 1938 . . . Made a trip to New York during production of "Hands Across the Border" to star in the Madison Square Garden Rodeo. Begged to be allowed to ride up front with the motorman on his first trip through a subway. Was champion dart thrower of the Sixth Avenue Penny Arcades. Garnered more space in New York newspapers than any other actor since Valentino . . . While the picture was being prepared for shooting, Roy was working full time with his pigeons which he trains for the Signal Corps. Gave General MacArthur, Winston Churchill and Jimmy Doolittle to Uncle Sam just before he climbed back on Trigger for H.A.T.B.

NORTHERN PURSUIT

Errol Flynn in an old tweed suit can create a tidal wave of fainting femininity. Errol in the uniform of the Northwest Mounted Police will have you swooning in the aisles. The role he plays in "Northern Pursuit" fits him like the uniform. Steve Wagner is dashing and handsome and brave as 16 lions. He is also not too bright—or anyway that's what Colonel Von Keller (Helmut Dantine) thinks. Von Keller is a German flier who has been landed in Canada, with several companions, from a submarine. They have a sinister and important task to perform, but there are obstacles in the way. One of the obstacles is Steve Wagner.

When Steve first encounters Von Keller, the flier is wandering through the wilds of Northern Canada, lost and snowblind. His companions have been killed by an avalanche, but he is plowing on with Teutonic determination, trying to reach his rendezvous with a secret agent from the States. Steve and another "Mountie," Jim (John Ridgely), find Von Keller. But Steve who is of German descent, sends Jim in alone to headquarters and stays in a cabin with the sick flier.

Orders are immediately sent out to get both Steve and Von Keller. Steve, apparently furious at the treatment he receives from Headquarters, resigns from the force. Von Keller is put in a concentration camp, but escapes, and Steve is again brought in for questioning. This time he knocks down his superior officer and says "To hell with Canada!" In fact he's thrown into jail.

Is it just an act? Is he baiting a trap for Von Keller? The one who wonders most about this is Steve's fiancée, Laura (Julie Bishop). Steve is bailed out of jail by a mysterious stranger and promptly disappears. Somewhere he and Von Keller and the agent from the States are together—somewhere in the vast bleak wilderness north of Bear Lake. Steve is facing Nazi cunning with Canadian courage, but the odds are heavy against him.

You'll find this an exciting picture. Helmut Dantine is almost unbearably convincing as the German flier. And, as I keep saying, there's Errol!—War.

P. S.

Between scenes Errol managed to finish his book, "One Man in His Time," which is his third novel. Second, not published, is "Charlie Bowtie Comes to America." . . . Helmut set a precedent by writing one of his scenes. Job was turned over to him because of his knowledge of Nazi psychology . . . Russell Hicks, a bit player in the picture, will be more familiar to many servicemen than Flynn. Hicks is the principal player in "The Articles of War," which every soldier in training is required to see every three months.

"What's happened to our Marriage?"

1. I met Stan when I went to work in a war plant. We fell in love, were married . . . and at first had a beautiful life. Then suddenly . . . a barrier between us! I, who counted so on our precious hours together, was crazy with grief!

2. Then one night, we went out with Kay and George, our closest friends. Later, Kay and I were alone and she asked why I looked so tragic. Anxious for sympathy, I told her my troubles. "Sue, darling," she said when I finished. "It's so simple. You know, a wife can often lose her husband's love if she's neglectful about . . . well, about . . . feminine hygiene . . ."

3. "See here, Sue," she suggested. "Why don't you try Lysol disinfectant? My doctor recommends it for feminine hygiene . . . says many modern wives use it." Then she told me how this famous germicide cleanses thoroughly . . . deodorizes, too. "And besides," she added, "Lysol's so easy to use. Just follow directions—it won't harm sensitive vaginal tissues."

4. Now, Stan and I are more happily in love than ever before! Kay was absolutely right about Lysol. It is easy and economical to use—and it works wonderfully!

Check this with your Doctor

Lysol is Non-caustic—gentle and efficient in proper dilution. Contains no free alkali. It is not carbolic acid. Effective—a powerful germicide, active in presence of organic matter (such as mucus, serum, etc.). Spreading—Lysol solutions spread and thus virtually search out germs in deep crevices. Economical—small bottle makes almost 4 gallons of solution for feminine hygiene. Cleanly odor—disappears after use. Lasting—Lysol keeps full strength, no matter how often it is uncorked.

Merry Christmas to our readers . . .

Come to think of it, this will be our first Christmas together, won't it? Last year, this page didn't exist, and we didn't really know you . . . Especially because Christmas is coming up, we're glad we can chat. At Christmas we need friends. It's like having lots of logs piled on the fire when there's frost on the windows—and thinking, "to heck with the frost!" . . . This Christmas, of course, nothing can keep all the frost out. At countless family tables, there are empty chairs, empty plates, empty hearts. Church bells ring this year. But stifling their message of peace on earth is the thunder of guns, the muffled agonies of a tortured world . . . But, like we said, friends help. We have grown awfully close to the readers of MODERN SCREEN. Every month, some fifty thousand of you write to us. We laugh with you. And sometimes you tell us your troubles. Through our questionnaire, you help us edit the magazine. From your letters we get warm glimpses of you—and the shy, fine admiration you show for fine people like Laddie, Ronnie Reagan or Frank Sinatra . . . So do you know what we'd love just because it's Christmas? A Christmas card from you. Just send us one, and see what happens!

"The Modern Screen Gang"

Camp McCall's brass band met Betty and hairdresser. Paratroopers jeeped 'em 25 miles thru swamp. Arrived with layer of red dirt on faces.

THE MEN

She never does anything in a small or inconspicuous way; she is lusty, gregarious, whole-hearted. "When I sing," she told Dorothy Lamour one day, "I don't stop by putting my neck in it. I put my feet, ankles, knees, torso, teeth and topknot into every note. Gosh—do I knock myself out!"

When she sings "Murder, He Says," she exercises more muscles than Bernarr Macfadden has ever examined in the body beautiful. When she sings "I'm Doin' It For Defense," she brings admiring chiropractors from miles around, inarticulate with admiration for such mobile joint mounting. When she sings "The Fuddy-Duddy Watchmaker," the Amalgamated Union of Mexican Jumping Beans gets up a picket line bearing the placard "Unfair!"

After she had finished her stint in Madison Square Garden recently before an audience of 22,000 customers (breathing hard out of sympathy), Betty Hutton stepped to the microphone and gave the bond buyers their final joyous jolt by announcing her engagement to radio-writer Charles Martin. Mr. Martin was in the audience at the time, but he is a wise man and knows when a fiancé should be seen—flanked by the rest of the audience—and not heard—beside such a master of sound as Betty.

The wedding, Betty told reporters, won't take place until January. Hollywood wisenheimers, delighted with Betty's effervescence and her eagerness for change, will (Continued on page 25)

Wires curled when Betty toll-called fiancé Charles Martin about rumored engagement to someone else. Martin wired back roses. Betty's in "The Miracle of Morgan's Creek."

Betty, who outmugs Harpo, was made honorary paratrooper after one of the guys leaped to platform; kissed her and yelled, "My wife just had a baby. I had to kiss someone."

I LOVE!

Betty's joshed and jitterbugged with them, sung till her throat's gone froggy. She loves the whole Army. And the feeling's terribly mutual.

In "Two for a Show" on B'way, Betty turned nursery rhyme into hep-happy free-for-all, was IN from then on. Perfected knock-out tactics with Lopez's band. On set, Betty knits between scenes, needs no last minute cramming on lines

BUCK ROGERS IN THE 25TH CENTURY

After first night at Casa Mañana, owner Billy Rose said, "All I ask is, don't tear down the house." Betty eats like a prize fighter, practically never tires, sleeps in dibs and dabs (in gigantic bed), is easy bait for round of penny poker.

Betty was heller in grade school. Played sand lot baseball, "shinny," tin-can hockey in neighborhood alleys. Even earned scar (on left cheek). At 14, stormed B'dway with peanut-sized band, flopped miserably. (With Don Ameche at Command Performance.)

give you 20 to one that the marriage never occurs. Maybe they're wrong. Maybe not. Meanwhile, everybody loves Betty. What tabasco is to steak, what Roquefort dressing is to salad, what Manville is to Reno—that's what Betty is to Hollywood. And to camp shows. And to personal appearance trips. And to bond tours.

Although this was possibly her most spectacular appearance to date, there have been other trips and other climaxes. That swing to Army camps through the South, for instance. After leaving the continental train, Betty, her publicity man and Doris Harris, her hairdresser, took a local. It was hot. It was dusty. There was no food on the train. And Betty was supposed to be a glamour girl.

She wore a simple dress that indicated several of the reasons she photographs so well, but which was also utilitarian because it could be washed. She wore no stockings. She wore spectator pumps. So the famed Hollywood glam reputation had to find an exemplar in her hairdo, of course. Each morning, Doris combed the fragile, fine, glinting Hutton hair. She swirled it and upswept it; she added a cluster of flowers and—because Betty's own hair kept shedding curl as a roof sheds rain—a dreamy set of artificial bangs. "Those bangs," someone in the group allowed, "make (Continued on page 88)

On periodic diets, Betty pecks at cottage cheese, crackers and skim milk, sees visions of steak, French fries and chocolate malteds. Likes heavy food—in large quantities.

ter reading script of "Star Spangled Rhythm," Betty, despite ter- ambition, bounced into head office in dither, moaned, "I'm ed. This part's too big for me." (With make-up man Bob Ewing.)

Kathryn Grayson taught Betty to chirp operatic aria. In return, Betty coached Kathryn on "Murder"—with gestures. Caused riot when they tried it at H'wood Canteen one night.

BIG BOY

Wife Barbara's limbering up for the dance routine she'll do in Sonny's coming pic, "When I Come Back." Blond giant's sloughed 15 lbs. for part. Says Par.'s signed him for rest of life.

Paulette Goddard saw his screen tests run off and said, "He's for me." She calls him Flash Gordon. Also the Amiable Ambler. He's six-foot-four, blonde, loose-limbed, slipjointed, and moves at an easy lope across the Paramount lot with his grin, his Hi! and his lifted forefinger. He calls a bird a buhd—the only giveaway that he comes from Boston.

Whether his eyes are blue or gray has been a question for years. There's no question about the humor behind them. He takes his sudden startling emergence on the Hollywood scene with the same kind of balance and sanity that you felt in "Kansas" on Corregidor. Only time he got excited was on hearing that his younger brother, Lieutenant David Tufts of the U. S. Navy, had been decorated at Nova Scotia for saving a munitions ship from destruction by fire.

Himself, he's 4-F by virtue of a cracked pelvis, an enlarged heart, two knees that slip out when he's not looking, a crushed right hand, a bursa of the shoulder and some minor flaws that we won't go into. They skiid wild in Winchester when he was a boy, and Sonny skiid wildest. It got to be something of an event when he came home uncracked.

At the draft board, his chart was so full of red marks you could hardly read the thing.

"What the hell do you do for a living?" asked the man at the desk.

"I'm under contract to Paramount."

"Yeah? What are you? A stunt man?"

He was christened Bowen Charleton Tufts III, to be known thereafter as Sonny. The nickname's juvenile flavor doesn't worry him. To him, it's just the name he's always been called by. Even Charles Seymour, the President of Yale, called him Sonny. The president is a distinguished looking gentleman with silver-gray hair and a clipped moustache. Against a background of bearded Monty Woolleys in hooded gowns, he was handing out the diplomas on graduation day. The ceremonies were going out over the air. The names rolled impressively. T. At Yale, drum-boogie Tufts threw 5 dance bands together, took one on 22 summer cruises across Atlantic. At one point in career, gridiron hero was M.C.-ing in beer joint.

As assistant editor of Yale record, Sonny says he used to drape himself over typewriter and read Benchley and similar stuff all day, then bat out what were practically carbon copies.

ust one week after Sonny was introduced to studio execs, e was on the set—acting. Did most of his business out of amera range till Goddard and others straightened him out.

"I'm no actor," says Sonny. "I just go to the studio at 9 and come home at 6. In between I say lines." The Tufts range from 6 ft. 2½ to 6 ft. 8, swear it's due to milk. Sonny's 6 ft. 4.

The Christmas Alan Will Never Forget

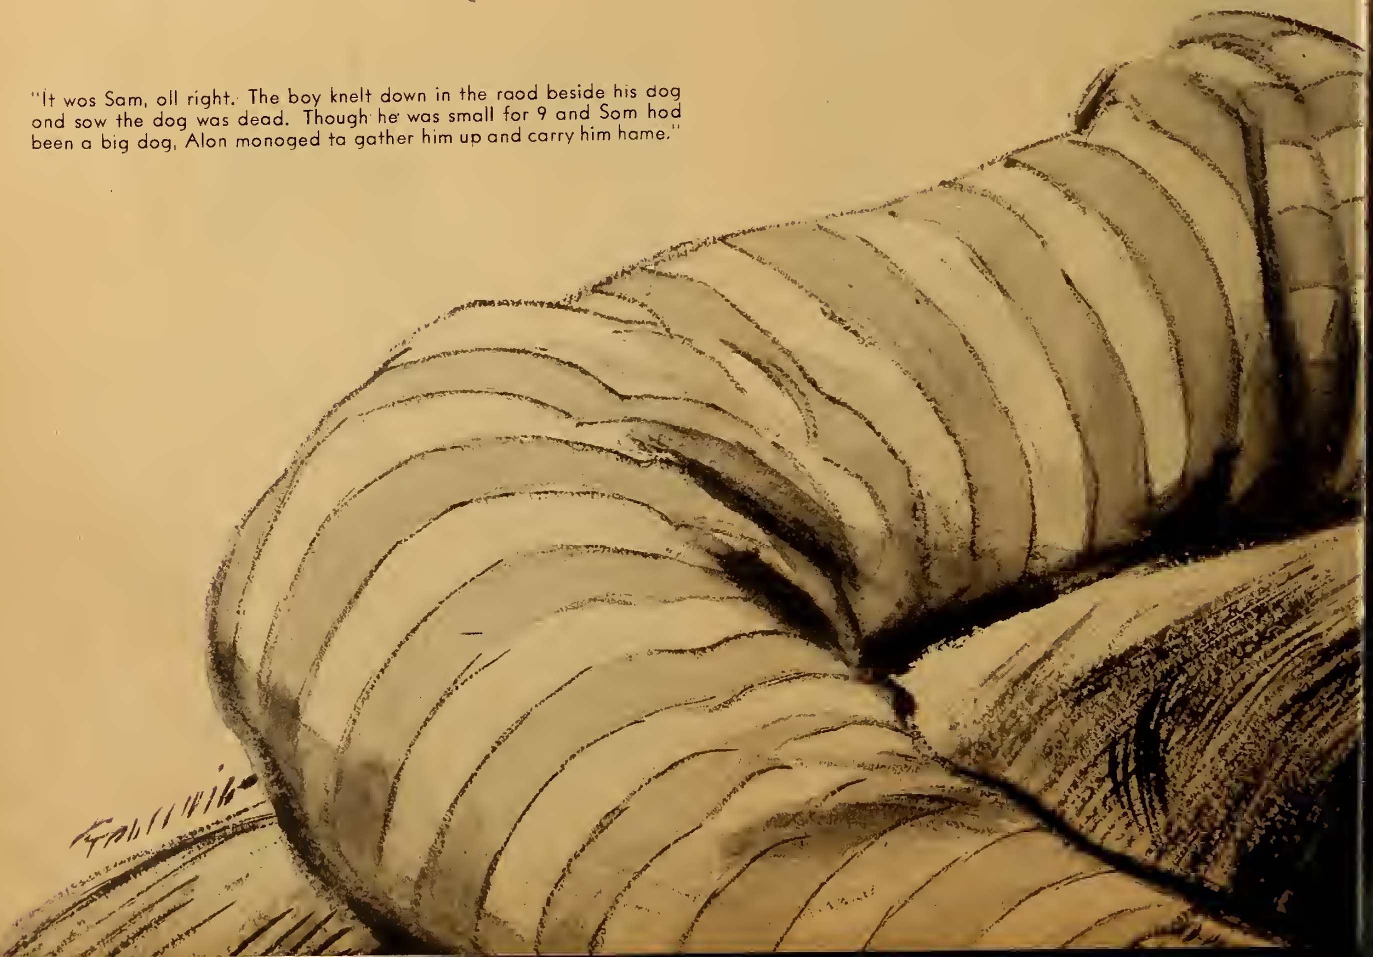
It was a Christmas of stabbing pain back when Laddie was nine and Sam, his shaggy mongrel, died.
But in it, too, there was a kind of wondrous joy.

He was only nine, but privation had made him old before his years. He remembers that Christmas for many reasons. But mostly as the Christmas when he grew up.

Not that he put it in so many words to himself. It wasn't till years later that he recognized it as a kind of turning point. His first encounter with the shock and grief of death. His first realization that you couldn't do anything about it. His first glimpse of the knowledge that material values don't count beside those of the spirit. If that's not growing up, what is?

At the time, it just seemed that a lot of things all happened around Christmas that year. They hadn't been in California long. His stepfather had just bought the little lot in Alhambra and put up a garage. The house was supposed to come later, but it never did. Alan thinks they knew even then that it never would, because his stepdad had partitioned the garage into front room, kitchen and tiny bedroom.

Alan had the bedroom. They got water from the filling station across the road. They bathed in a galvanized iron tub. Their heat, such as it was, came from a little old oil burner. But Alan felt fine. He liked the man his mother had married. It was no longer just the two of them against the world. Mom had been right. But then, she always was. "Everything'll work out." That was her slogan. It might be potato soup now, but next week it was going to be



"It was Sam, all right. The boy knelt down in the road beside his dog and saw the dog was dead. Though he was small for 9 and Sam had been a big dog, Alan managed to gather him up and carry him home."

By Nancy Winslow Squire

"He stuck Chris inside his pajama top and started back. There was a funny look on his stepdad's face. Not mad, just funny. Below Alan's pajama top, Chris's tail waved gently something wonderful. So surely and calmly did she believe in the future that Alan accepted faith as a matter of course. Tough luck was only temporary. Everything would work out.

Now, after years of struggling alone, Mom had someone to help her. After months of camping out, they had a roof over their heads. Alan was helping, too. Every day after school he'd whistle to Sam, his collie-police dog, and they'd trot off together to sell papers at the El Sereno junction. It was the best spot, because a two-car track came in from Alhambra, and a three-car track from Pasadena, and people got off and changed cars and went in to Los Angeles.

Mom was always afraid of his getting hurt, but shucks! he could take care of himself. It was Sam he used to worry about. No more, though. Not since he'd trained Sam to go lie down in front of the drugstore till he got through. He was a smart one, that Sam. He'd never budge, but his eyes would keep following Alan till he saw him pull the last paper out from under his arm. Then he'd start barking like crazy and run out to the curb and wait. No matter how excited he got, he wouldn't step so much as a paw over the curb till Alan came and got him.

Walking home, they'd stop to look in at the Christmas windows. Alan wished he could have a paper route. With a route, you earned more than standing on a corner. But you couldn't have a route unless you had a bike, and bikes were for rich kids. You could dream, though. You could dream you had a bike and a route and could walk right into this store and buy a Christmas present for Mom.

Mom said presents didn't matter. What mattered was how you felt inside on Christmas and every other day. Mom said, if you couldn't afford to give, then wanting to give was just as good. But Alan noticed that she always managed to give him something. Even last year, which was the worst, she bought him some books and hid 'em in the closet, and he found 'em ahead of time and read 'em. Never let on, though. Acted just as surprised on Christmas morning.

He squashed his nose against the window glass. "What would you buy for Mom, Sam, if you had money?"

It was two weeks before Christmas. He was playing ball with some fellows in the school yard. Just as the bell rang for the afternoon session, a boy came running in from the street. "Alan! Hey, Alan! Your dog got hit by a car on the road."

Alan laughed in his face. "You must be crazy. I just saw him when I was home for lunch."

"Yeah? Well, I just saw him about two seconds ago, and he's layin' there, and he don't look good to me—"

Alan's feet were taking him down the street. They felt like lead. Why didn't they move faster? Everything felt funny—his head was light, his chest so heavy he could hardly breathe. What was he worried about, anyway? That kid must've seen some other dog that looked like Sam. Sam (Continued on page 71)

"Then, at last, he put his hand out. Solid. Real. A bike. His eyes went first to Mom's face, then his stepdad's. He couldn't talk. His feelings were too mixed up. He was crying inside."

Gob and a Girl

They're wonderfully typical, these two, with Gig Young in Navy blues, Sheila in a war plant, and the whole darn crew piling into the kitchen for Sunday dinner.

Gig wants a little girl just like Sheila. She wants a replica of Daddy, green-brown eyes, dark brown wavy hair. Both agree on two kids.

The day, nine months ago, when Gig Young ceased to be an actor and became Byron Barr, seaman, was one he will long remember. He had been told to travel light; he assembled only the bare necessities for the trip. Razor, shaving soap, comb, brush, toothpaste and brush, half a dozen handkerchiefs and Sheila's picture were carefully wrapped and arranged in a cardboard shoe box. Perhaps, for a moment, he looked at the meager belongings that a man can carry from one physical life to another: the bodily comforts and the single symbol of love.

Then he reported to the railway station and was assigned to a Pullman equipped with tier bunks. Friendships began to develop. Gig met a boy who had been halfway through his medical training when he (Continued on page 85)

Big guy finally dropped bag in front hall at 1 P.M. At 2 he was at work on combine. Timed furlough for harvesting. Grows peas, flax, oats on 600 acre farm run by brother.

Typical furlough day: Up at 5, in fields by 6. Lunch, with neighbor's wheedling him into ride on pet nag. Work thru sundown. Dinner at 9. Bed at Work togs: Jeans, broken-down shirt. Dinner clothes: Jeans and clean jers

George scooted over to new 10,000 acre ranch first chance he got. Burst with pride at 3,000 acres of white pine, grazing land for 750 head of cattle. Brothers bought it for him last April.

Routine was upset when George hitched to Great Falls to sell $10,000 worth of bonds at dry goods emporium. The whole clan turned up for farewell dinner and Mom's chicken a la Russe.

Furlough at end of 6 months came, luckily, so George could skip home for the season he's never yet missed . . . even while he was in Hollywood. It's Corporal Letz now, on duty somewhere outside the country.

Something for the Girls

The coke crowd thinks he's snaky. The bridge set thinks he's Henry Aldrich in a reet pleat. And a sweet-faced girl named Gwen thinks Don O'Connor's Clark Gable—without the ears.

Till last January, Mom was the only woman in the life of Universal's "Top Man," Donald O'Connor.

Now there's Gwen Carter—17 in October and a senior at L. A. high school. Don was 18 last August. She wears a gold bracelet he gave her. There's a key, then "DON," then a heart, then "GWEN." On his 18th birthday, she gave him a silver identification bracelet. It says "DON" outside, and inside, "I LOVE YOU. GWEN."

His two women met in Mom's kitchen. Don had a date with Gwen and two other kids. He was late getting ready, so he guessed he'd go pick 'em up and bring 'em back, and they could listen to records or something while he finished dressing. Mom was washing the dinner dishes as they trooped in. She knew the others. So the little one—soft brown eyes in a heart-shaped face, floating chestnut hair—

"You must be Gwen," smiled Mom, "and Don's got good taste."

Gwen's answering smile was a little shy. But when the others headed for the living room, she hung back. "That looks like an awful lot of dishes. Could I dry them for you?"

"Lord love you, child, they don't mean a thing to me. Now if you really want to be good to me, go in and play the piano nice and loud. I always did like a lively tune with my dishes."

The O'Connors, close-knit to begin with, have drawn closer through the years. Of seven children, only Don and Jack are left to Mom. Three died in infancy. A small daughter was killed in a street accident. Then there was Bill, (Continued on page 40)

Don says marriage can wait—2 years. But tied Gwen Carter up with whopper of a diamond. Says he wants 5 kids some day, 3 boys, 2 girls. Also wants to play "Hamlet" in movies.

When Don was tyke, Mom said only way he could wriggle out of practicing the piano was to break a finger, so he promptly broke a finger.

By Ida Zeitlin

Couple months ago, Don arrived at Gloria Jean's house to take her to movies, forgot wallet, blushingly accepted loan from Gloria's pop. Most valued possession: gun that belonged to John Barrymore, whom he hero-worshipped, given him by Diana.

First time Don saw himself on screen, he gulped "Who's that stupid looking punk?"—then slunk out. The "punk's" next pic for Univ. "This Is the Life."

After scanning date possibilities at studio, Don found gal who looked young enough, asked her out, found she'd been married couple of years. (With Annie Rooney, niece Patsy and Gwen.)

Peggy Ryon's pet story's about Don spotting prowler on grounds. Shouldering 22, he yelled, "Hands up or I shoot." Character behind bush snorted, "Who you kidding, sonny?"

Don's pattern of perfection. In their vaudeville act, Bill would pick Don up by the scruff of his neck, whirl him like a pinwheel and land him on his feet, to mad applause. To express the height of his ambition, Don used to say: "Maybe some day I'll be as good as Bill—"

Two years ago Bill went to Peoria for the Christmas holidays, contracted scarlet fever and died after four days' illness. It was months before his brother's face lost its stricken look.

Having worked literally from infancy, Don grew up with a sense of responsibility. After Bill's death, it deepened—especially in respect to Mom. Sometimes Patsy, Jack's 14-year-old daughter, also under contract to Universal, wishes he'd confine it to Mom. His normal greeting to Patsy is: "What's the matter with your hair? What's the idea painting your nails that color?"

"Make him leave me alone, grandma," she wails. "The minute I show up, he starts picking on me."

Gwen describes him as the kind of boy who decides he's going to do a thing and does it. He decided to buy a house for Mom and bought it—with the money he'd saved while he was at Paramount. Mom's been traveling 'round all her life, working pretty hard—it's just about time she had her own house, he figured. Himself, he didn't particularly want a house. Made him feel funny. Settled down, kind of. But he got over that pretty quick. It's nice not to worry where the dough for your next hotel bill's coming from.

Mom has fun buying furniture and working 'round the house all day. Help? Hers is the age-old cry. "I'd rather do it myself than go chasing behind someone else to do it."

"Sure it's not too much for you, Mom?"

"Know what would happen if we got a maid? I wouldn't know what to do with myself, and I'd start getting cranky."

Don watches it, though. If he thought she were overdoing things, he'd put his foot down. He's got quite a lot of say over things—more than his brothers had when they were his age. And he thinks it's all right being boss, if you don't take advantage.

The screen prepares you for a jumping jivester. He's anything but. The exuberance is there, but under leash. Even when he's laughing his head off inside, his face doesn't show it. Slapstick's the only thing that makes him laugh out loud. "Me, I'm all mouth," says Mom, "but the boys are quiet."

His steady blue eyes make you feel he's a guy you can tie to. His emotions are warm, if casually expressed. He says hello to everyone on the lot, whether he knows them or not, and it makes him mad if they don't say hello back. His ambition is to learn all their names, so he can say "Hello, Fred" instead of just hello. That way you feel closer, says Don.

He never leaves Mom without kissing her. It may be a quick kiss, but that's fine with her. They both hate to be fussed over. Being busy and young, he'll sometimes forget her birthday. The last time it happened, a jeweler called on Mom a few days after the event—

"Your son sent me over. He said you're in the market for a watch. Here are five watches. Which do you like best?"

She made her choice, and he handed her a card. "Don said this goes with it." The card read, "I'm a drip, but I love you, Mom."

One day last December he was watching the auditions for "Blackouts" at El Capitan. His eyes wandered and came to rest on five-foot-two-and-a-half, brown eyes in a heart-shaped face, floating chestnut hair—

"Whose that girl?" asked Don, trying to be casual.

"Gwen Carter," said the girl he knew in the show. "Her father's the orchestra leader."

"Introduce me, will you?" She introduced them. Presently Gwen left. "Do you know her phone number?" Don asked his friend.

She eyed him coldly. "What if I do?"

That stopped him till New Year's Eve. At the party he went to, a girl mentioned Gwen's name. "Do you know Gwen Carter?—Look, I'd love to have her number—"

"Well, I'd have to ask her first."

"Okay, you ask her. And in case she doesn't want to give it out, maybe she wouldn't mind calling me just this once. Sure, I know it's not etiquette, but I have to get hold of her some way."

Call him! Gwen should say not. Who ever heard of a girl calling a boy? "You can give him my number, though. I don't mind."

She says their first date was at Grauman's Chinese. He says it was Chinatown. They argue about it all the time—

"We went to Casa d'Amour for dinner," says Gwen, "then to Grauman's Chinese, and next night to Chinatown. He thinks we went to Chinatown first, but we didn't really."

"We went to Chinatown and got a flat tire," says Don. "She thinks we went to Grauman's Chinese, and you know how women are—have to have their own way."

Wherever they went, it was together—and neither has dated anyone else since. They bowl or play miniature golf. They go to Venice and do the rides. Gwen balks at the roller-coaster, which Donald dotes on. Once he went 18 times in a row.

When the boys can get week-end passes from training camps, they go to Larry Krieger's—Don's best friend—and jitterbug. The crowd includes Ann Rooney—Gwen's best friend—Gene Reynolds, Larry Nunn. The Lindy and Slicker are their favorite dances. They don't go to night clubs, and they don't smoke or drink. Don took a sip of Dubonnet on his 18th birthday and didn't like it. As for smoking, he won't even kid about it. "I hate it," he says soberly. "Especially for girls. It takes some of the sweetness away."

When he works next day, he's supposed to be in by 10:30. His intentions are good but, you see, it's like this—

First, they stop at a drive-in. No evening feels right unless you stop at a drive-in for turkey sandwiches and malts. Then he takes Gwen home. Gwen says, "You can only sit down for a minute, because you've got to be in by 10, so—" Then they start discussing things, and the next time they look at the clock, it's 11:15.

Mom says she can't fall asleep till Don gets home. Every time she hears a siren, she thinks it's Don. He tries to talk her out of it, but you know how women are. His brother Jack's 37 years old, married 15 years; and Mom still isn't relaxed about him yet.

She says she can't fall asleep, but half the time she is asleep, so he tries to get in without waking her up. Leaves the car out, because the garage makes a racket. Listens at the back door for the refrigerator to go on. If he can time it to slip in while the current's on, he's okay. Sometimes she hears him open the refrigerator to get his bottle of pop, and down she comes.

He takes the words right out of her mouth. "Sorry, Mom, I'm late. We got to talking. I'll make it up tomorrow night."

What more can a fellow do than say he's sorry and he'll try to do better? Mom lets it go at that. Besides, you'd never get anywhere with Don the strict way. He's got too much of the bullheaded Irish in him. Besides, there's no argument. He thinks she's right. Can he help it if something always comes up?

So he climbs into bed with (Continued on page 90)

Editor's Note: We asked Grant Lewi to give us a picture of 1944 that would thrill every reader. Here it is. 1944 for the stars. And, in case you care, 1944 for you.

He has limited his personal predictions to your love life, your family life, your work—and travel. By "love," Mr. Lewi means you and your joe, if you're single—you and Hubby, if you're married. The business about work applies equally to school, home or job. By travel, he refers to any activity that brings you into contact with new places, new people, new ideas.

We offer you Mr. Lewi's predictions with a word of warning. Don't laugh them off. They have a fantastic knack of coming true!

If you were born in Aries (March 21-April 20)

Love: Romance favored March-July, especially favored Apr. 11-May 4. Except glamour, permanence.

Family: Changes in home life around the end of June. Be progressive, alert to opportunity; avoid strife and rebellion; be independent but friendly. Make a new start after July 5. Don't quarrel with your elders, those who share your life with you.

Employment: Major opportunity breaks for you after the end of July. Look for happiness and progress through routine. Protect health from excess.

Travel: New starts at end of June and after may take you into a new environment, perhaps through marriage, work. Very active travel influences after Nov. 25. Broaden and expand, but avoid breaks due to temperament, strife, mere discontent. Short journeys likely anytime this year.

Aries-born Sonja Henie faces disappointments, perhaps hardships. There seem to be disruptive influences in her home life, which can affect her health through nerves, worry, responsibilities piling up on her. That house she's just bought may prove a headache—she's going to find that she needs the man in the family, may rebel against the war that keeps Dan away. Sonja's year seems centered in her personal life rather than in her career. Starting at the end of March, she must watch health carefully; vitality isn't what she'd like it to be, and if she doesn't heed the warnings of fatigue and other symptoms, she can run (Continued on page 76)

The Beautiful People

By Kaaren Pieck

Gene Kelly's world revolves around Betsy and Kerry. Betsy's world revolves around Kerry and Gene. Kerry's just over a year old. Her world revolves round her stomach, with her parents somewhere close to the hub but still outside it. She welcomes them with cries of simple pleasure. She welcomes food with a moan of pure ecstasy and falls on it like a wolf in babe's clothing.

That's by her father's account. Gene's a split personality where his child is concerned. Part of him stands outside himself and says, "So she's our kid, so what, there have been others." That part tries to be objective, but who does it think it's kidding? The other part just lets go and wallows in adoration.

He thinks he's lucky. Out of all the guys in the world there were to marry, the only girl in the world married him. They met at Billy Rose's Diamond Horseshoe Show. Gene was dance director, Betsy Blair came looking for a job. If the movies were shooting it, they'd show a flash of dark eyes and blue, meeting and holding. It was almost as swift and sure as that. She was still only 17 when they married. Gene had been tapped for Hollywood, and by that time there was no question but that, where he went, he was taking his lamb along.

Their honeymoon's all mixed up with tumbleweed. They drove out West—this was well before Pearl Harbor—and Betsy had never been out West before.

"When we hit Texas," Gene told her, "you'll see tumbleweed." He described the prankish grace and gayety of tumbleweed. He got her all hot and bothered about tumbleweed. They crossed Texas, their eyes panting for tumbleweed, and there was no tumbleweed. They reached the state's western edge. Beshrewing the day he'd ever mentioned the stuff, but grimly resolved not to let Texas get away with it, Gene turned the car round and doubled back. No tumbleweed. Betsy (Continued on page 74)

Sunday night picnics on the kitchen table. Receptions for baby at 3 A.M. A kiss in the middle of a tea party. Life with the Gene Kellys reads like a fairy tale!

Scar on Gene's face dates from bike fall 25 years ago when he was five. In pre-college days he wanted to be a priest, studied journalism, law, medicine, before he hit on hoofing. Paid tuition mixing cement by day, soda-jerking by night!

When baby was born, Gene burst into tears at the good word. They'd planned to call her Bridget, settled for Kerry.

TYRONE POWER

Ty was 18 when he got to H'wood, eager, confident. But one year changed that. Here's the 2nd, tougher part of Ty's moving life story.

Tyrone Power is signed up for the biggest fight of his life today as a Lieutenant of United States Marines in the battle for freedom. Already, starting as a private, he has won his bars with distinction in less than a year. Hollywood is not surprised. Nor is anyone who knows the story of the slim, eager, intense son of an illustrious father who became one of the greatest stars Hollywood has ever known.

Battling through desperately sick days as a baby in California, Tyrone, Jr., grew up in Cincinnati, Ohio, where his mother, Patia, taught in the Schuster-Martin Dramatic School. But his frail boyhood body was no measure of his spirit, his fierce determination to lead in whatever he undertook and to run his own affairs. He made his mark in school, had his normal helping of mischief and adolescent romances. But smoldering within him always was the call of the Power heritage, a name great in the theater since the 1700's.

At high school graduation, Ty announced he intended to act. "All right," said his mother, "but you've got to be the best." Tyrone adopted that phrase as his secret advice. Skipping college, he joined his father, (Continued on page 50) who promised to teach him all he knew of acting.

Tyrone. Jr.. 17, played Shakespearean roles with his father in New York and Chicago, then came with him to Hollywood where Tyrone, Sr., had a part in "The Miracle Man." Young Ty met movie celebrities, was welcomed everywhere with his famous father. The outlook couldn't have been rosier.

Then one night, between Christmas and New Year's, he awoke in the Hollywood Athletic Club to hear his father gasping for breath. Tyrone Power, Sr., died in his son's arms.

Stunned and desolate, his rosy future now black, Tyrone Power III realized he was no longer a kid, the son of a famous father. He was Tyrone Power, on his own. And he was just 18. It was up to him, alone, to make—or break his future.

His first days alone in Hollywood were to young Tyrone Power an unbelievable, empty dream. A wise man once said that no young man actually believes in death. Ty at 18 had never met it before. Once when his dog, "Nig," had got old and rickety, they took him away. But all his family, even Grandmother Reaume, were hale and hearty. He remembered nothing about his own babyhood struggles to live. What he had been through could not have actually happened, he felt. When his father's rites were over, he tramped the streets of Hollywood trying to figure things out.

There wasn't any answer.

Shortly after Glenn Ford had joined the Marine Corps, Eleanor Powell asked him—during one of those hurried week-end trips to Los Angeles—"Why don't you buy one of those Marine dress blue outfits? I think they're awfully good looking."

Glenn, listening raptly to a Shostakovitch recording, shook his head. "Not for me," he said. "Someone around town might think I'd grown too big for my olive drabs."

Somewhat later he was advanced to the rank of corporal, and Ellie greeted the announcement with a blissful sigh. "And think how nice your gold stripes would look on those Marine dress blues," she added, flirting at Glenn from a corner of her eyes.

Glenn shook his head. "I will not be cajoled," he said. "No dress blues."

When he became a sergeant, Glenn and Ellie began to make wedding plans. Glenn wanted Ellie to wear white satin; he wanted a double ring ceremony, which would be performed in Eleanor's house in the exact room in which they had spent so many hours getting acquainted, then falling in love, and finally planning for the future. "Just a small wedding, with only our families present," he said, sticking to the Ford tradition of no swank.

Ellie was in complete accord with the plans—with one small addition. "Now, for the wedding," she suggested, as if for the first time, "I think you should wear dress blues."

Columbia studio before entering the Marine Corps, wore the traditional dress blue uniform of the Marine Corps. He is a sergeant, stationed at Camp Pendleton."

Ellie wore a white slipper satin dress, made with short, puffed sleeves and a throat-hugging cowl neck. Over each ear was a small bouquet of orange blossoms which held her tulle veil in place, and she carried a bouquet of white orchids.

Mrs. Blanche Powell gave Eleanor in marriage, and Eleanor's matron of honor was Mrs. Joel Delson, the sweet-voiced secretary who has long handled the Powell affairs with tact and efficiency.

If you remember your romantic dope from previous issues of MODERN SCREEN, you will realize that this marriage was actually the work of that cleft-chinned cupid, Mr. Pat O'Brien, who knew both Glenn and Ellie long before they knew each other. He considered this to be a mistake. He told Glenn, "You aren't the average guy, so you'd never be contented with the average girl. You should meet and fall for someone special—like Eleanor Powell, for instance."

The next time the O'Briens were giving a party, they invited both Eleanor and Glenn who—with that cognizance of two naturally wary people—decided that this was a set-up, and that in a diplomatic way they would have nothing of it. Which proves how wrong a girl and a boy can be when trying to outwit an Irishman.

As soon as the war is over, you will be seeing Glenn again in the vigorous roles he likes so well, but probably there will be no more glorious dancing Powell pictures because Eleanor plans to make marriage her career.

He was keeping a close watch for the busiest bird in America.

However, the plane outsped the stork this time. Lieutenant and Mrs. Oleg Cassini reached Washington in ample time for Miss Antoinette Cassini (to be called Toni) to put in proper and unhurried appearance, weighing a mere four pounds. Cobina Wright Jr. Beaudette's young son was born at 10:10 A.M. one morning. Shortly after luncheon that same day the telephone of a friend rang and a cheerful voice announced, "This is Cobina. Have you heard about my baby? It arrived this morning!" And that wasn't the only call placed by the enthusiastic young mother. You might quote that to the next biddy who says our generation is soft, and starts to give you that rugged grandmother routine.

Little Red Riding Points, or Goldilocks and the Three Steaks:

While Dennis Morgan was in Oregon on a bond tour, he snatched a few hours from government business to go buck hunting. "Ah, venison for the Morgans," he sang triumphantly, rubbing his hands together. He had the deer meat properly segmented, packed in dry ice and shipped to Los Angeles where it was placed in cold storage against the winter's dearth of red coupons.

Now Dennis and his elder son, Stanley, have frequently gone hunting together with a BB gun. They have knocked tin cans off fence posts and peppered an occasional oak tree in the valley shallows, so Dennis felt certain that Stanley would be interested. He described his feat glowingly, and Stanley listened carefully, finally observed in a sorrowful voice, "I know you did it for us kids, but after you had seen 'Bambi,' Daddy, it must have been awfully hard on you to shoot that poor deer."

Mr. Morgan has said nothing about his hunting trip since that moment. He thinks he should write to Mr. Disney and sign the pledge.

On Thursday, when the maid is out, Joan Fontaine has been rushing home from the "Frenchman's Creek" set to prepare dinner for herself and Brian Aherne. Ordinarily the maid leaves some succulent dish in the ice box ready to be heated.

What was Joan's delight recently to find two prepared salads in the cooler, fresh rolls ready to be slipped into the oven, and a thick cut of steak back in one corner of the refrigerator. In front of it was a covered dish which the delighted Mrs. Aherne, having spotted the steak, simply ignored even as you and I would.

She broiled the red points, then set up the feast. Brian found the dinner delicious, the steak done to a turn.

The following morning the maid rushed from the kitchen just as Joan was departing for the studio. "You didn't eat the stew I had cooked and left in that covered dish," she said, swallowing rather carefully, "so you must have eaten the horse meat I bought for the dog."

Beef Grief:

When Homer was a little boy calf, he had guileless brown eyes, soft ears and uncertain legs, but he liked to wrestle with Jimmie Craig. Whenever Jimmie had a day off, from "Kismet" or some such Metro picture, he spent it on his farm doing odd jobs and wrestling with Homer for exercise.

Homer's shoulders enlarged and his weight increased; still he liked to wrestle gently with his owner. Then came the day when Homer heard, from a gossip columnist no doubt, those stories about bulls. He took the rumors seriously and catapulted Mr. James Craig against a concrete retaining wall, luckily some 15 feet distant.

X-rays revealed three broken ribs. So Metro took advantage of Jimmie's sedentary state by assigning him to the nearest studio (Continued on page 79) best memorial he could offer a father like his was to go on with the show.

There were messages from Cincinnati. They wanted him to come back home. Later, when he had got over this shock, maybe then—

Ty walked into the Hollywood Plaza Hotel lobby and sat down at a desk. "Dear Mother," he wrote, "I love all of you more than ever. But I've decided to stay here and carry out my plans. I think that's what Father would have wanted. Know you'll understand." Mrs. Power understood. She and Ann came out soon to Hollywood to tell him so.

There were other letters, from New York and London and cities all over the world. And a great stack of wires and telephone messages from Hollywood.

These heartened Tyrone. They made him feel his Dad was still with him, still introducing him to the people he must know in his new profession. He pulled himself together and shook off the despair of loneliness. He moved out of the Athletic Club into a one-room Hollywood apartment. He got his clothes pressed and his hair cut, and then one day he hopped a bus to a studio.

He asked for the big studio man who was his father's friend and who had written such a warm letter. Secretaries smiled and opened doors promptly at Tyrone Power's name. Ty was ushered into the big office like a prince. The producer greeted him warmly, had him sit down.

"So you're Tyrone Power, Jr!" he smiled. "Well, I knew your father when he was the greatest Brutus that ever played 'Julius Caesar'! Yes sir—I'll never forget one night in London—"

He reminisced for an hour and a half. He traced Tyrone Power's career over three continents. He was charming and finally he said, "Well, you'll have to come in and see me again some time—any time."

Before he knew it, Ty was outside the studio. He still hadn't said what he had come to say: What about a job?

That was the way it went. That was typical. Studio doors opened like magic to Tyrone Power's name. He spent hours with people telling him about his father.

At last it dawned on Ty that he was really a curiosity. He was Tyrone Power's son. He wasn't a personage himself.

He stopped seeing his father's friends. He just went around cold and hunted a break. Then he heard what was really the matter with him. "Too young." "No experience." "Nothing for your type."

And so the months passed. Tyrone had a little money to live on. There was a small inheritance, pitifully small, from his father. He couldn't get it for a while, but his father's attorney volunteered to advance him $10 a week against it. That's what he had to live on—and that was all.

Tyrone moved all around. In that first year he lived in 15 different places, rooms, apartments, dinky hotels, guest houses, shacks—about everything. It wasn't always by choice. One day his landlady came in, apologetic but determined. She said she'd have to have her rent, or else.

"All right," said Ty, "I'm broke. I guess it's 'else.' I'll move." And he started lugging out his trunk.

"No rent," she said, "no trunk."

Ty shrugged. He gathered up his loose belongings and moved out. Four years later he called by to redeem that trunk. The landlady remembered him and, by then, she knew who he was. She was very polite. "Your trunk hasn't been touched," she assured him earnestly. "Everything is just as you left it." Ty thanked her and winked to the friend who had come with him. When they got the trunk outside, Ty opened it. Inside were a stack of old telephone books.

In the summer following his father's death, Patia Power drove out to Hollywood with her dramatic class from Schuster-Martin. She found Ty living over a garage on Orchid Street, right up from Hollywood Boulevard. She was shocked at the state of his wardrobe and general underfed condition. But she was happy to see the same eager sparkle in his black eyes. Enthusiastically he told her he was "working." The job turned out to be a speculative rehearsal for a local Hollywood show, "Lo and Behold," that later went on to New York to make a hit as "New Faces." Ty didn't go with the show.

The home town kids who journeyed out with his mother that summer—seven of them in an old Pierce Arrow limousine—the "Traveling School of the Theater" Patia called it—did Ty a lot of good. He had made friends in Hollywood, but they were mainly the casual hard-bitten permanent-extra type of kids whose only real ambitions were to hang around Hollywood and have fun.

Patia Power took a house in Hollywood that summer for her crew, and while they were in town Ty ate regularly. When it came time to leave, she suggested that Ty drive back to Cincinnati for a visit. She thought it would do him good, and she knew he could stand some more home cooking. But about that time what seemed the break he'd been waiting for came along. At Universal a picture was getting ready that would use lots of juveniles. "Tom Brown of Culver," starring Tom Brown. Ty knew Tom and had been tipped off. And Tom put in a plug. While his mother was in town, the studio casting office called, actually called him. He got the part; $500 salary. They mentioned a contract. This was it! Ty was always an optimist. The Traveling School of the Theater traveled on home to Cincinnati. Everyone was happy, especially Tyrone, waving them off. He'd show them now! Ty almost wore out the script of "Tom Brown of Culver." He had a respectable little part at first. But in the end it was cut down to nothing much. When the picture came out, Tyrone Power showed up in a brief bit, and nobody noticed him. He asked Universal about the contract. The answer was: "What contract?"

For the first time since he had tried to crack Hollywood, Ty was discouraged. Up until then he had grinned at all the kicks in the teeth and laughed off the tough times. He was young; he could take it. He worked for nothing and lived like a tramp, but cheerfully—because he though some fine day the break would arrive.

Ty quit going out with his friends. He did a few bits when studios called him. But he stopped haunting the casting directors. He felt betrayed.

Of all the friends of his father's i Hollywood, one in particular had measured up. Arthur Caesar, top Broadwa playwright and Hollywood scenarist, too more than a curious interest in Tyron Power's son. Caesar realized the spo needed was not pats on the back, but aid and advice. He placed himself, as much as anyone could, in the role of father-confessor to the youthful Ty.

Arthur Caesar's home was always open to Ty. Whenever he needed a square meal or good advice, he went to Arthur's.

To keep his independence, Ty contributed his part. He refused to take a job with anyone, but since Arthur couldn't drive a car, Ty became his chauffeur. For a while he lived over Caesar's garage, driving the writer around the studios and eating with the family. It was natural that now, discouraged, mixed up, he should go to Arthur for advice. Caesar gave it.

"You can hang around here and scratch for a break," he said, "and you may get it. Lots of kids have. But what if you do? Will you be able to handle it? Listen: There's only one solid way to make the grade in Hollywood—that's to rate it. That means acting experience. You haven't got it. Go get it. If you're asking me—I'd take the first train to New York."

Ty didn't tell him that he'd already been down to price tickets East. That's the kind of a kid he was—still.

Tyrone had been in Hollywood a little over a year the day he climbed into a day coach at the dingy old Los Angeles station. Ann, visiting in San Diego, came up to see him off. It wasn't an auspicious departure. Ty had just enough in his pants to eat on. He didn't have quite enough to get to New York, so he'd bought a ticket to Chicago. Chicago was where he had first trod a professional stage with his father. Ty knew some people there. He thought he might get a job and stake enough to start him off in New York.

When the train pulled out, Ann cried. Her brother looked so frail and lonely waving out the smeary window of the day coach. She knew how he hated to quit anything, to admit defeat; she knew his pride. But if Ty felt bad about leaving Hollywood, defeated, he never let it show. He kept a brave smile beaming until the coach vanished down the track.

In Chicago he found something going on that changed his plans. The World's Fair Century of Progress Exposition was going full blast. On the Midway there were plenty of jobs for entertainers. When Ty mentioned he was from Hollywood, he didn't have any trouble. He signed up for skits all over the Midway. For a while he had an ironic job—at the Hollywood Pavilion—a place that purported to show exactly how pictures were made in Hollywood. Ty acted a movie star in the make-believe set. He got $30 a week. Sometimes he got his check, sometimes not.

He found a place to live in a barn on North Dearborn Street, a bunk-together deal with other youngsters working the fair. He needed to save some money. Chicago was a great radio center. So he haunted the stations in off hours and kept in touch with theatrical circuits, too. It paid off. Ty got some jobs. He appeared on a couple of programs with a fellow named Don Ameche, who was to get his Hollywood break the same time as Ty.

He had better luck in the theater. Eugenie Leontovich, Gregory Ratoff's wife, starred that summer in "Romance" in Chicago. Ty grabbed a small supporting part in "Romance"—his first real crack at any sort of steady play. It lasted eight weeks. He saved his stake.

Anyone seeing the peaked youth pile off the crowded bus in New York, his suit looking like an old pair of pajamas and three days of black beard on his pale cheeks, would never have guessed that in less than two years the same young man would be mobbed in the same indifferent city, as the most sensational young star out of Hollywood!

Broadway was a lot like Hollywood as far as jobs went. Everyone knew the name, Tyrone Power. None was interested in giving that name a job. Like a million kids before him and a million more to come, Ty haunted the agencies and producers' offices, smiling at the icy-eyed secretaries—and getting nowhere. His bankroll shriveled. Plenty of times it was a toss-up whether to spend the last nickel at the automat or on a bus.

Later, on his first trip to Manhattan as a Hollywood celebrity, Ty stayed at the Waldorf-Astoria. Naturally, he was besieged by reporters, photographers and famous people. Invitations to dinner and swank soirees swamped him. Social leaders and cafe society queens like Elsa Maxwell bid for his handsome presence to make their parties buzz. One night, after a steady round of this, the biggest affair of all came up. Ty was in his dinner jacket, all set to go, sitting in his room with a pal from Hollywood.

The pal said, "Ty, I'll bet everyone in New York knows who you are by now—think of that!"

"Nuts," replied Ty. "I can take you to a place where nobody will give me a tumble." They made a bet of a buck. Then Ty left the hotel, giving his society hostess the slip.

He took a cab down to an address way below Forty-second Street, ducked down a side street and led the way to a basement restaurant. The air was heavy with smoke, garlic and stale wine. A fat Italian waiter waddled up.

"Why you stay away?" the waiter grunted. "You no lika da food?" Ty said he'd been busy, but he liked the food and he wanted some right now, including wine.

The waiter looked him up and down appraisingly, then, suspicion in his voice, he asked, "You a-workin' now? You sure?"

Ty said he was sure. So the waiter took a chance, served them, and Ty won his dollar. Nobody in the place gave him a second glance.

Katharine Cornell — the Incomparable Kit—really discovered Tyrone Power. Darryl Zanuck made his name a household word and his face romantic to millions. But it was Cornell who first had any real faith in the son of the famous father. The idea wasn't entirely original with her. When Tyrone and his father first played Shakespeare together in Chicago, Helen Mencken, a good friend of Cornell's, mentioned in a letter: "Tyrone Power is here with a tall, handsome son, Tyrone, Jr. The boy is green but watch out for him. He has talent, and he's definite Broadway material." Cornell remembered that. When her husband-producer, Guthrie McClintic, mentioned that Tyrone Power's son had been in the office and said he was in New York to crash Broadway, Miss Cornell had an idea.

So had Tyrone. His idea was that if he was ever going to be a Broadway star himself, he'd better be seeing some of the top shows. At that point it didn't look like he was due to be the main attraction very soon. But that posed a problem.

This month's prize winner:

Perhaps this isn't the kind of a letter you're looking for but, if it's sacrifice you're hunting, consider this: Have you ever crawled on your belly through a stinking jungle and listened to the whine of machine-gun bullets just over your head, or waded through vermin-filled swamp clear up to your hips wondering when your number was coming up? Walked a lonely sentry post in the dead of night, when a twig snap sets your nerves tingling, never knowing what might come out of the blackness at you? No, but you probably know someone doing this very thing and doing their share of War Bond buying, too. A guy thinks a lot of things when he gets into things like that. Mostly about home and those he loves. Some of us get back in pretty good shape, others aren't so lucky. We try to make the whole mess out a bad dream, but no go, it's very real.

We're anxious as hell to get it done, so along with our regular business of soldiering we like to feel that we're buying in on the future and give some of our dough back to our Uncle Sam every month, so's he can give us the stuff we need, when we need it. Don't let anyone kid you, he's doing a swell job of it, too. 10 percent? It's that and a lot more.

How can you see Broadway shows at $4.40 or worse, when you are needing two-bits regularly for a dinner at the automat and no visible source of income? There was one show Tyrone particularly wanted to see—Katharine Cornell in "Flowers of the Forest" which was just opening. He remembered that her manager, Stanley Ghilkey, had known his dad. He thought he would just sort of drop around and chew the fat, and he might get across a hint that he could use a couple on the aisle.

He dropped in Ghilkey's office. "Mr. Tyrone Power? Oh, yes," brightened the secretary. "Mr. Ghilkey's expecting you." Ty raised a black eyebrow in surprise, but he walked right in. The manager said, "You got our call, then—that's fine. Here are the tickets." Ty's head buzzed. What went on?

"Sixth row, center," said the manager. "Drop in tomorrow. Mr. McClintic is expecting you." That was even goofier! But Ty wasn't spoiling this by asking questions. He grabbed the seats, got on the telephone and got a date. That night he went to the play in style. Next morning Guthrie McClintic hired him as understudy to Burgess Meredith's lead opposite Katharine Cornell in "Flowers of the Forest."

When summer came, Ty joined the straw hat circuit at Katharine Cornell's advice, as "Flowers of the Forest" closed. He went up to West Falmouth, Mass., with a contract to play "Romeo and Juliet" with Cornell in the fall. He worked like a Trojan all summer to be ready. He played cooks and cops, heavies and heroes. He shifted scenery and painted sets.

"Romeo and Juliet" tried out in Baltimore. Patia Power came up from Cincinnati to see it. Ty played Romeo's friend Benvolio. The part wasn't sensational, bu one critic said this, "Small though his par is, Tyrone Power gives it a feeling yo don't forget." After the performance Cornell told Ty, "You did very well." Tha was high praise from her. Ty grinned, " was scared stiff." Patia Power was mor critical. She pointed out to him where h was okay and where he was weak. Sh said, "You'll have to work hard."

From then on he developed a mania fo work, and so he lived modestly in an apartment with a couple of friends, spendin all his waking hours studying the stage Katharine Cornell rewarded him with th part of De Ponlengney in her production o "St. Joan." Ty received a telephone cal backstage one day.

The other actors heard him laughing int the mouthpiece.

"Somebody," he roared, "wants to know I've ever considered acting for the movies!

That was a joke to Ty—after all the tim he'd spent trying to get a nod in Holly wood! The talent scout was persistent. Bu Tyrone wasn't having any. He told hi flatly that he was going to stay on th stage until he knew acting backwards an forwards. The critics liked Ty in "S Joan." He was better and he knew it. Th Hollywood offers came again. Ty kept say ing "No," but he began to wonder if h meant it. He took his problem to Kathar ine Cornell. Although she had alwa spurned movies, Cornell advised him make a screen test anyway. He did.

The test was terrible.

In fact, Ty's test was so gosh-awful, th by all the rules of show business he shou never have rated a train ticket West. Ar he almost didn't. One of the stories th tell around Fox today is about the da Darryl Zanuck, Twentieth's head man, ar his production staff watched Tyro Power's test. Ty, badly photographed, w thin and white, all eyes, eyebrows ar forehead. He was badly directed, to Everyone squirmed with embarrassme In the middle Zanuck picked up the boo 'phone. "Stop it," he said.

A producer grinned. "I was wonderi when you'd end the agony," he said. "Wh is it—N.G.?"

Zanuck puffed his cigar. "That's righ he said, "N.G. That is, the test. Wire Ne York," he told his secretary, "to make decent test of that kid."

So Ty made another, and while it w no prize-winner, it showed some of t electric personality that was later to reg ter on the screen. Tyrone Power was Lucky this trip. For several reasons.

One was that Zanuck was hard up players. He had taken over the old Fox not long before. He inherited two star and only two—Will Rogers and Shirley Temple. Will had just been killed tragically in an airplane crash in Alaska. Shirley was growing up and slipping from her dimpled box-office charm.

Ty hopped a train for Hollywood, expenses paid with a Pullman berth and everything this time. He was still 20 years old. He didn't tell his decision to anyone—his mother or Ann or any of his pals, except Katharine Cornell, until he had his ticket West.

He came to Hollywood and rented an apartment at the swanky Sunset Towers. It took about all his small check but Ty told himself, "If I make the grade this time, I'm going to jump, not creep!"

grand entrance . . .

He started his first picture of the new contract on May 5th, his birthday.

It was "Girls Dormitory," designed to introduce the French charmer, Simone Simon, to America Tyrone Power, Jr. (they tagged that "Junior" back on his name at the studio for prestige), played about two minutes on the screen in "Girls' Dormitory." He played the lonely schoolgirl's cousin who pretended to be her suitor. He sat on a park bench and pretended to make love to Simone. His part was incidental, and you could hardly find his name on the cast and credits.

But there was an odd little omen. As Tyrone made his entrance in the picture, the scene showed him bursting through a door at the girls' school, smiling full-face right into the camera. His first lines were: "Well—here I am!"

It was as if the words were meant for Hollywood. Here Tyrone Power was. No one at the studio had any idea what would come of that tiny scene. Fox big shots barely noticed it—so intent were they on the reception of Simone Simon. Simone didn't click as expected. But for some strange reason a ton of letters swept into the studio. "Who was the boy who played the cousin?" "Where did he come from?" "We want to see him again." Darryl Zanuck had a sensitive ear. He thought he sensed something stirring. He called Ty into his office, handed him a script. "Take this home and read it," he said. "Never mind a test. The part's yours."

Ty will probably never forget the first days on the set of "Sing, Baby, Sing." He played a fast-talking newspaper reporter, and he thought he was doing all right. But he noticed the director had him do scenes over again and again. He noticed the rest of the actors acted just a little funny toward him. He had the feeling something was going on, and he didn't exactly get it. What Tyrone didn't know was that the director didn't want him in the part. He thought Ty was too green and too unknown. He'd obeyed boss Zanuck's instruction, but grudgingly. And whatever Ty did was not right.

So Tyrone got the boot. It hurt him—bad.

But he drew a consolation prize in "Ladies in Love." There were three stars in that—Constance Bennett, Loretta Young and Simone Simon again. All had leading men. Ty's part was the smallest lead for the smallest part. The picture was only fair, but once again letters swamped 20th Century-Fox about Tyrone Power. And Darryl Zanuck still had to have new blood. His directors told him this Power kid was just so-so, too stiff and stagey for the camera, too perfect in his talk for one thing. Damned near as correct as an Englishman. That gave Zanuck an idea.

One day Tyrone found a note in the dinky little dressing room he occupied, in the rows reserved for bit players and extras. It was along about option time and he ruefully crumpled it up in his fist and tossed it into the wastepasket. "See me—Darryl Zanuck" meant, he imagined, strike number two in Hollywood. He was snakebitten for luck at this studio. Directors were hostile. Stars were standoffish. What the hell!

But he reported. Zanuck handed him the screen play of a super-special the studio was banking on to lead the year's program, "Lloyds of London."

"Take this home," suggested Zanuck, "and read it. Maybe you'll do it."

Ty's spirits zoomed. He said nothing to his friends, not even his mother, but, secretive as always, locked himself in his room that night. He read the script from cover to cover, and as he read, his heart began to sink right into the rug. He knew Freddie Bartholomew was already cast as young Jonathan Blake in the picture, and Freddie was at the height of his sensational career. Ty could discover no other possible part for himself than Jonathan Blake. As he read he asked himself anxiously, "Where the heck do I come in?"

He took the script back. Zanuck eyed him keenly. "Think you can do it?"

Ty shrugged. "What is there to it?" At that Zanuck exploded. "What is there? Are you crazy? Just the whole picture—that's all. Listen, son—this one's a star-maker!"

Suddenly it dawned on Ty that Freddie Bartholomew's part was the small one—Jonathan Blake as a boy. What Zanuck had in mind for him was the star job—Jonathan Blake grown up!

This time it was no give-away part. Ty had to earn it. He came up for a test, and tests were always his Jonahs. A little stock actress was assigned to emote with him. But when Ty got on the stage, shaky and scared to death, he almost fell over. There was a star he'd hardly dared approach before—Alice Faye.

"Thought I might help," she smiled. "Can I run through this with you?" Could she! Alice had always felt bad about Ty's getting booted out of "Sing, Baby, Sing." She has a heart built for size and, cannily wise in show business, she sensed this was the time to use it. Ty realized he did have friends after all. He calmed down. The test was a honey.

love on ice . . .

"Lloyds of London" made Tyrone Powe the hottest star in Hollywood. The pictur made tons of money, and the picture wa all Tyrone Power.

Ty had arrived, and he knew it. Something new and important had come int his life at long last.

But even before this turn in his lif arrived, something else had struck hi with a sweet, piercing pain. For the firs time in his life, Tyrone Power fell in love

It had been one day in the Cafe de Pari at 20th Century-Fox that a chubby littl blonde beauty with twinkling blue eye and an impish smile tripped over to th table where Tyrone Power was havin lunch and said:

"My name is Sonja Henie. I'm skatin down at the Polar Palace. Won't you com and see my show? Here are two tickets.

Ty used the tickets. He sat, spellboun at Sonja's symphony on skates. After th performance, he went backstage to congratulate her. "I hope I'll see you arou the studio," Ty said. "I'm sure you will Sonja laughed. They had a date the ne night.

When Sonja finished "One in a Million that made her Number Five in Hollywoo top box-office ten, she went on a natio wide tour. At the same time, Tyro Power, finishing "Lloyds of London," to his first vacation. It was odd, columnis noted, that at almost every city where Sonja played, Ty showed up—Detroit, New York.

He was East on his vacation, after chasing Sonja around the country, when he got a telegram from the studio. "Report back at once," it said. "New picture going right into production." It was signed by the studio casting director. Quickly they had whipped up a picture to co-star Tyrone Power and Sonja Henie. "Thin Ice" was to be rushed out while the headlines were hot.

Theirs was a gay, young healthy romance. Both were in their early twenties, and neither had had a serious love before. It may have been a coincidence that from the minute he fell in love with Sonja Henie, Tyrone Power couldn't miss. Perhaps the emotion—an experience of a love affair—was what he needed to mold him into a confident actor with a deeper, wider range. Anyway, all Ty's pictures were hits from then on, in rapid succession: "Love is News," "Cafe Metropole," "Thin Ice" (they finally made it), "In Old Chicago," "Second Honeymoon," "Marie Antoinette." Tyrone Power became the biggest romantic young star in Hollywood. And with his own rising star that of Sonja Henie kept pace. Nothing at all loomed in the path of their marriage—except that both Ty and Sonja were pretty young, and neither Patia Power nor Sonja's mother was too keen to see their brilliant children haltered by matrimony—yet it might have happened, this story book wedding, if Sonja Henie hadn't taken a trip back to Norway. Ty saw her off on the train. She meant to be gone only a couple of months. She stayed six. That was too long.

Tyrone Power was young, handsome, at the peak of his career and for the first time getting an intoxicating taste of glamorous Hollywood life. He was meeting celebrated people everywhere, and they were introducing him into the pleasant social life of the glittering screen colony. And he liked it. Ty never "went Hollywood" in all the time he was there. He always drove a modest car. He never threw his money around, became a clothes horse, night club barfly or a playtime Charley boy.

The only extravagance on record that Tyrone ever indulged in, in fact, while he was a great star, were foreign trips, an airplane, and once he leased an island off the Mexican Coast with great plans to make it a romantic paradise retreat. A vivid, romantic imagination, never one of Ty's deficiencies, inspired that. But he seldom went overboard—and never for girls. Although they besieged him (who wouldn't?), Ty simply could never be a Casanova. He was far too sincere for that.

But Sonja, his one girl, was away for a long, long time, and those months of Tyrone's life were too full and exciting to sit and pine. One night he went to a Hollywood premiere and sat enchanted at a petite, auburn-haired actress making an amazing comeback. Ty watched the picture with all the adoration of a fervent fan. He remembered those days when he was ushering in the Cincinnati movie house, how he would stand back of the curtained rail in the rear and dream about this girl.

Janet Gaynor was romantically free then, and "A Star is Born" had invested her with a new glamour. Ty fell hard. Sonja Henie learned about that in the newspapers.

It was more of a social, party and cafe romance than the Sonja Henie love. Janet moved in an established big-name Hollywood set. They went to smart dinner parties and danced at the latest, brightest places.

But in this period, Tyrone made the picture that put him at the peak of his career, "Alexander's Ragtime Band." By then his small-time beginner's contract had been ripped up time and again and a new one written. "Alexander" brought him a new boost. He was in the top money. On the face of things, Tyrone Power at last had everything he had ever dreamed of. He had everything but one thing very important—a home.

Tyrone Power's romantic dreams of Janet Gaynor and any he had left over about Sonja Henie vanished one afternoon at the entrance to the little test stage above Stage 4 at 20th Century-Fox, one afternoon in 1938. Two tests were scheduled that afternoon. A mere make-up one for Tyrone Power, the star of "Suez," soon to start shooting. And another of a new French actress who had never made an American picture. Hardly anybody in Hollywood knew Annabella Carpentier. Tyrone Power never had seen her.

Annabella had finished her test and hurried out the door at the exact moment Ty hurried in. They collided with a good, solid bump.

"Oh," gasped Ty, "pardon me!"

Annabella was so confused she lapsed into French, "Pardonnez moi!"

They looked at each other until the silence was embarrassing. Then the wardrobe girl introduced them. They didn't meet again until "Suez" began, but all the time Ty couldn't think of much else besides the pert, blonde beauty of Annabella and that intriguing way she talked. It wasn't a romance at first. There were some handicaps. First, because Annabella, though estranged, was still legally married to Jean Murat, a French actor. She had a daughter, Ann, in France. Even if Ty had fallen hard, which he didn't right away, Annabella could not have said yes.

But she was something that the too-serious, high strung and ambitious Tyrone Power had never met in Hollywood. She was a real person, a warm human being —that first, and an actress second. For the first time in his life, Tyrone was not leading; he was being led.

And so, finally, Annabella went to France to get her divorce, and after "Rose of Washington Square" Tyrone and a pal made a flying tour of South America. It was triumphant. It was riotous. All the Latin warmth, adoration and enthusiasm swamped Tyrone Power as he traveled from country to country.

But at last in Rio de Janiero he had had enough.

He was at the Copacabana when the cable came. "Boat docks Rio tomorrow. Love, Annabella."

And so at Rio, as the tiny boat lights twinkled out in the bay, and distant Sugar Loaf loomed blue-silver in the night, Ty whispered what he knew he would whisper one day and got his answer—"Yes!"

They came back together and were married one Sunday in the Bel-Air house where Annabella lived. Charles Boyer gave her away, and his wife, Pat Paterson, was maid of honor. Patia Power was there and Sister Ann and Grandmother Reaume. There was no official honeymoon because Tyrone was working in "The Rains Came." Later on, they had the honeymoon at, of all places, the Grand Canyon.

With Annabella, Tyrone has found a personal happiness he never approached in the restless striving days of his eager youth. With her he traveled to Europe, returned to the stage for summer stock. With her he bought his home at last, the lovely white house on a canyon's brink that Grace Moore had built but never lived in. With Annabella, Ty remodelled and furnished it to a bride-and-groom's dreams. With her, too, Ty went on acting, never lagging in the standards he had set for himself as a star. "Johnny Apollo," "Brigham Young," "The Mark of Zorro," "Blood and Sand," "A Yank in the R.A.F.," "Son of Fury," "This Above All," "The Black Swan"—great pictures all.

And in this ripened phase of his life Tyrone, too, developed as a person. He had leisure to read and quiet evenings to talk and develop his philosophy of what it's all about. He has had the seasoning responsibilities of husbandry and adopted fatherhood to broaden his character. Even his slim body has matured into a powerful physique that makes his frail boyhood days unbelievable. He has become a responsible citizen and a man. And so he was ready to face another more real and trying test. He was fit to serve his country when his country needed men.

Because Tyrone Power's short but outstanding record as a Marine is no accident. Months before he was enrolled he plunged into a rigorous regime of exercise to harden his body for the beating he knew he must take. For years he had seriously studied flying, buying a plane, winning his pilot's license and taking off steadily in defiance of his own studio's ban. That's why he tried desperately to get in naval aviation when war broke, and then, considered too old for that, he applied for the glider group, until it was discontinued. Now at last, after winning his bars the hard way in the Marines, Ty is in the air, in training at the Naval Air Station at Corpus Christi, Texas.

He was home in Hollywood on leave a few weeks ago—tall and straight and tan with his dark hair cropped close and a keen enthusiastic look in his eyes.

He spent his ten-day leave at home with Annabella and his family. Only once did Ty leave his home. That was for a Naval Aid performance at the Playtime Theatre. The day after he left for Corpus Christi, Annabella left on a bond boosting tour.

The brilliant career that lies behind him today is only a memory, and the future, bright again though it can be, is something he isn't worrying about yet.

The other day at Quantico, Lieutenant Power saw a young Marine in his teens slumping around the grounds with a sloppy carriage. He called him to attention and dressed him down. "At your age," he said severely, "you ought to be ashamed of yourself. I can hold myself straight and look at me—pushing 30!"

Pushing 30. Ty thought that over afterwards, and his own words amazed him. He felt exactly as young and strong and as cocky and confident as he was at 17 when he set out alone from Cincinnati lugging his dinky imitation leather valise, headed on the quest to make Broadway and Hollywood yield to him the fame and fortune which he sought. Now he was 29, pushing 30! It didn't seem possible.

Yet so much had happened.

I SAW IT HAPPEN

We'd been sitting through Jimmy Dorsey's stage shows from 10 a.m. until 7 p.m. Finally, Mr. Dorsey looked down at us (we were sitting in the first row) and said, "I know you're hungry because you've been here all day, so I've had a little lunch fixed for you." And out he came, a tray of milk and sandwiches for each of us. Nice guy that Dorsey, isn't he.

couldn't be hit by a car. Not Sam, who'd never step so much as a paw over the curb unless Alan took him.

It was Sam all right. The boy knelt down in the road beside his dog and saw that the dog was dead. Though he was small for nine and Sam had been a big dog, Alan managed to gather him up and carry him the short distance home. Mom wasn't in. She'd gone out to market when Alan left for school. He carried his burden round behind the house and laid it down. He wasn't going to cry. He was too big to cry. Mom hadn't cried when his father died—anyway, not where he could see her.

He'd been too young then to understand the implications of death, that he'd never see his father again. He understood now. A swift vision formed—of himself at the junction, pulling the last paper from under his arm—and no answering yelp of joy, no dash to the curb, no eager eyes upturned, no feet trotting beside him. A tide of agony washed over him, flung him down with an arm across Sam's body—where he lay and let the sobs rack him.

Presently he rose, found a spade and buried the dog under the window of his little bedroom, so he'd always be near. Then he walked off alone toward El Sereno.

When Mom found out about Sam, she said, "I'm sorry, son," and that was all she said. It was all Alan wanted her to say. Mother and son were alike. When they felt most deeply, they talked least.

But it couldn't have been more than two or three days later that the kitten appeared. Alan found her curled up one afternoon on the old Army cot that was his bed. Mom said she'd just walked in. When he sat down, she jumped right into his lap and started purring. Pretty darn cute.

From the first, she attached herself to Alan, and her devotion and furry helplessness warmed his heart. He pretended Sam had sent her as a Christmas gift, so he named her Christmas and called her Chris for short. A slight family difference arose on the subject of her sleeping habits. Chris thought she belonged at the foot of Alan's bed. So did Alan. His stepdad said it wasn't healthy to sleep with an animal in the room. Cats should be put out at night.

So between them, Chris and Alan developed a system. He'd put her out, she'd run round to the back window, he'd climb through and bring her in. Next morning he'd toss her out again, and everyone was happy.

On Christmas Eve he went to bed early. Something mysterious and pleasant was in the air—he could tell by the way he'd been kidded at supper-time, by the way Mom's eyes shone. He'd brought Chris in, and they lay together in the dark corner farthest from the doorway that had no door. Quietly, breathlessly, Alan waited.

"I'm going to nail up some planks," his stepfather called, "so you can't see Santa. He might get sore if you caught him."

Alan grinned to himself. He'd known for a number of years who Santa was. "Okay," he said.

"Meow," said Chris.

"Alan, I thought I told you to put that cat out."

"Yes, sir." He picked Chris up and went slowly toward the front door. Of course he could bring her back later by the window, but it just didn't seem right to put her out at all on Christmas Eve. She might get her feelings hurt. They didn't put the animals out of the manger when the Child was born.

He opened the door, stuck Chris inside his pajama top, closed the door and started back. There was a funny expression on his stepfather's face—not mad or anything, just funny. Alan looked down. Hanging below his pajama top, Chris's tail waved gently to and fro.

James Beavers must have decided that, for tonight anyway, he'd risk hypothetical germs against a kid's longing. "Some cats have no tails," he said gravely, "and some tails have no cats. Now get in with you, so I can nail up these boards."

Chris slept sweetly all night. Alan didn't. At intervals, he'd stick his head out to look at the sky, which was full of stars. The family had agreed that, when the last star blinked out, he could call it morning. As a rule, Alan loved the stars. They made him feel peaceful. That night, though, they just acted stubborn. He said, "Please stars, go out." He said, "If I was a star, I'd go out for you." He said, "All right, you ole meanies, see if I care." Next time he woke up, the sky was gray, but one star still twinkled. He kept his eyes riveted on it, till at last it faded. Then he jumped up and pounded at the planks.

He's had his fair share of thrills in recent years, but they haven't overshadowed the thrill of that Christmas morning when he stepped through the gap to be dazzled by a Christmas tree, under which lay a B.B. gun and—!!! He looked again and rubbed his eyes and looked a third time. Yes, it was still there. A bike!

You've got to understand that to Alan the thought of owning a bike was something as far-off, as unattainable and glorious as, say, a phone call from Garbo would be to a fan mag writer. Neither could happen except in a dream, and Alan's dream had come true. He doesn't know how long he stood looking before he moved. Then he circled it. Then at last, afraid it would vanish under his touch, he put his hand out. Solid. Real. A bike. His own. His eyes went first to Mom's face, then to his stepdad's. He couldn't say a word. His feelings were too mixed up. He was crying inside.

Later he went out, B.B. gun in one hand, the other wheeling his bike. He pedaled up and down in front of the house for a while, then rode her up the hill, which she took like a bird. If you've read his life story, you know what happened next. The rich kids lived on the hill. They attended the same school as the poor kids down below, and some were swell and others were stuck-up brats. One, a bully as well as a brat—whom Alan had disliked from the first—rode a shiny new bike of his own and broke into noisy guffaws at sight of Alan's.

"Secondhand Ladd with a secondhand bike. Whyncha give it to the junkman?"

It was easy to fire Alan's temper. This time he controlled it. "Wanna bet my bike's better'n yours?" he asked steadily.

"You're nuts."

"Okay, I'll race you."

They raced down to Alpha Street, and Alan won. Without even waiting to gloat, he steered his way home.

"Mom, have I got a secondhand bike?"

"Yes," she said quietly. "We couldn't afford a new one."

"It's better'n a new one," he blazed. "I just beat a kid on the hill, and his was new."

Through his loyalty and defiance, the hurt was plain. "Sit down a minute, son. I want to tell you something.

"You know what Christmas means. You know it's not presents. We give things to children because the wise men brought gifts to the Child at Bethlehem. He died so many years ago that sometimes people forget that the gift doesn't matter. Only what goes with it.

"So in a way, I think maybe you're right. Maybe your secondhand bike is better. But not because you beat the other boy. You see, if we had a lot of money, we could just have gone to the store and bought the best bike in the place, and that would have been the end of it. Well, we couldn't do that. So we had to start a long time ago, saving a little here and a little there and getting a thrill out of it, thinking how happy you'd be. And the biggest thrill of all was seeing your face this morning.

"Can you understand, Alan, or are you too little? It's not the bike. It's being glad to give up things because you love someone else very dearly. It's being happy because you're making someone else happy. That's what Christmas means. That's what went with your bike. That's what makes it better than a new one maybe."

"Sure, Mom," said Alan. "I understand. It's like when I was little, and I asked you was there a Santa Claus, and you said he was God. That's the same thing, isn't it?"

She gave him a swift hug. "Exactly the same."

They weren't given to demonstration, but for once Alan didn't disentangle himself. Against her shoulder, he found words for the question that had ached in his heart for two long weeks.

"Mom—you said the angels took Daddy. D'you think—they took Sam, too—even—even if he was just a dog?"

"I know they did, Alan."

"D'you think—he's happy?"

"I know that, too."

Then he broke away. "I'm happy, too, Mom," he crowed. "I'm gonna get me a paper route."

* * *

It was the nicest Christmas any boy could have had.

Last Christmas was the nicest any man could have. Alan wishes Mom and Sue could have known each other. Sue gives Christmas the same feeling his mother did.

Last year was special. The baby was due in March. Alan would be entering the service in January. Sue didn't know yet and he couldn't spoil things. He'd tell her when the holidays were over. . . .

Christmas Eve. Holly and mistletoe and little Santa Claus nooks all over the house. Christmas cards lined up on the mantel. The tree standing ready to be trimmed. But first they had packages to deliver. In Beverly they picked up a soldier, headed downtown. They couldn't let him be late for a Christmas party, so they took him downtown. On the way home, they picked up a sailor.

"Where you going for Christmas?"

"Nowhere particular."

"How about coming home with us?"

So the sailor helped Alan trim the tree. Sue wasn't allowed to help. (If Alan had had his way, he'd have packed her in cotton wool till the baby came.) They hung up five stockings. Two soldiers were coming in the morning. Alan disappeared and returned, hiding something behind him. He was very busy at the mantel for a couple of seconds. When he moved away, a tiny stocking, filched from the baby's layette, hung beside the others. . . .

Christmas morning. Like Christmas morning in millions of American homes. Sobered by the shadow of war, but Christmas just the same. Ohs and ahs and tissue paper flying and laughter and hugs and maybe a tear or two. Practical gifts this year—nothing flossy in wartime. Negligees and a bedrest and comforter for Sue, the expectant mother. Sports jacket and suede shoes for Alan—who was just as tickled as if he didn't know they'd have to be put in moth balls till the war was over. . . .

People dropping in all day. Fifteen for turkey and plum pudding at five, with Alan carving. It's a job he hates. But Sue likes the bird brought in whole, brown and noble-looking. So he grunts and carves. . . .

Much later that evening. The guests had left. Sue and Alan sat watching the fire burn down. He spoke of his mother. She'd died in '37 before he became Alan Ladd of the movies. Too soon to enjoy the years of ease that would have followed the years of struggle. Too soon to share his happiness.

But Ladd, tough guy of the screen, remains her son.

"If she could only have waited," sighed Sue. "If she only knew—"

He spoke with the quiet conviction of faith. "She does know."

THE BEAUTIFUL PEOPLE

finally persuaded him that she could live without it.

A month or so after landing in California, they drove down to San Diego. "You'll see gardenias," said Gene.

"This," Mrs. Kelly said, "I'd like to see."

They drove and they drove. No gardenias. "Nothing," mourned Betsy, "but a bunch of old milkweed rolling along—"

Gene let out a yip. "Milkweed! It's tumbleweed, Betsy, good old tumbleweed, followed us all the way from Texas—"

Having been introduced, Betsy watched with respect. Then—"Where d'you s'pose the gardenias'll catch up with us?"

The experience paid dividends. They had a mob at the house one night, playing their favorite game, Indications. It was Gene's turn to act out the word. The minute he came rolling into the room like a hoop, Betsy shrieked, "Tumbleweed!"

Their friends were awed. "You people are hypnotists."

Before Kerry, they lived in a little house in one of the Hollywood canyons. They're incorrigibly social. They hate to go to sleep. Almost any night would find their gang at the fireplace, popping popcorn, eating hot dogs and beans and potato salad. Betsy loves picnics, Gene hates them. "They're young," he says.

"We're young," Betsy points out.

It was something of a wrench to leave the little house. But Kerry was coming, and they needed more room. They were scared at first by the size of the places they looked at—especially Gene, who'd spent his New York years in hotel rooms and small apartments.

They finally rented what still seemed to them a mansion. But though the rooms were spacious, they were simply furnished. And one of the bedrooms could be easily converted into a sunny nursery for the baby. And their friends, the Dick Whorfs, lived on the same street. And in time they'd get used to a kitchen where you had to walk from the stove to the refrigerator, instead of just reaching.

On Broadway, Betsy was one of those overnight sensations in Saroyan's "The Beautiful People." Her baby's the reason she doesn't go back to work. She won't have a nurse because the baby's bound to do something cute today that she didn't do yesterday, and heaven forbid Betsy shouldn't be around to see it.

Gene's pretty deft about doing infant chores, while protesting loudly. "Who, me? Kelly, the movie actor? Change a baby's pants? You must be crazy." He's nonchalant now, though he used to be a little tense. The one time he really got scared was when she was three weeks old and wailed through the night. Betsy was still in bed. He had 60 pages of script to study and a 7 o'clock call. Chasing between his script and his child, he grew distracted. "She hates me," he informed Betsy gloomily. "I can see it in her eyes."

At 14 months Kerry's such an agreeable girl that her dad likes to hear her bawl once in a while. "Just to prove she's not slap-happy." He addresses her indiscriminately as Dopey or Angel, and is firmly convinced that she's going to be a dancer. This stems from the day when she pulled herself up by the edge of a cigarette table, stood on her toes and admired herself in the mirrored top.

Like him, she's a night owl. "Won't go to sleep till you hit her over the head." This fails to bother her parents, who don't go by the psychology books. Deaf to the cries of the orthodox, they've been known

YOU, UNDER THE MISTLETOE

There'll be mistletoe this year, just as there's always been. And plum pudding. And dancing and fun. But when your conscience keeps nudging and pricking, you can't be very gay, can you? Especially when you think of all the fellows who aren't around this year. The Red Cross needs you . . . needs your nimble fingers and your quick, unfuddled mind. They need you in a hundred different capacities. And you need them because they give you a chance really to do things, to be of genuine use. Get down to see the Red Cross people today at your local chapter. Ask them what you can do. Then go and have the best darn Christmas ever!

to haul her downstairs at 3 A.M. to meet the people. "Trains her to cope with life," the Kellys maintain.

The one thing she resents is the end of a meal. Take the spoon away, and she sputters all over her bib. Pop eggs her on. "Attaboy, Kelly, stand up and fight."

Like most families in wartime, the Kellys now have a maid and now they don't. Betsy takes the maidless intervals in stride. "So what, lots of people never have any help." She looks like something moonlit out of a fairy tale, but there's nothing frail about her capacity for work.

for the love of pike . . .

She loves to cook—learned partly by watching her mother, partly out of a book. From Gene she learned to cook fish. She'd always loathed it, but the first time they went out to dinner, he took her to a fish place and—well, you know how it is on your first date—she choked it down—

Gene, for his part, is a convert to custard, her favorite dessert. But only the way she makes it. Otherwise it's still pablum and the hell with it. He's also one of those who can't understand why God made little vegetables. Betsy serves them and looks hopeful, but that's as far as she'll go. Things don't matter enough, says Betsy, to make a fuss about.

Dishes, for instance. She hates them. Gene hates them worse. So she washes them. Once in a while conscience pricks, and he offers to help.

He's the Sunday chef. "The way I slave Sunday mornings!" They eat heartily around noon—melon and potato cakes made from leftover spuds, and scrambled eggs—no one, brags Kelly, can tie him for scrambled eggs, they're eider down—and honey from the comb and sausage or bacon, for which they save their ration points.

Betsy goes to the butcher in pigtails and what Gene calls her "Claudia" look. "Takes a mean advantage of the guy's protective instinct and brings home the bacon—"

By 3 the neighborhood kids have gathered in the backyard for a game of kickball. Gene's nuts about kids, and it works both ways. They call on him for aid, advice and plain conversation. One lad, a doctor's son, lugged his printing press over to be admired.

"Got a business scheme I'd like to talk over with you. Thought I'd print my dad's cards and leave 'em around at doors. Drum up a little trade."

"Did you tell your father?"

"No, I want to surprise him."

Gene persuaded him that the surprise might be on the other foot, and switched him to selling War Bonds.

If they haven't already asked people in for the evening, they'll start phoning around eight. "What you doing tonight?" Their cronies include the Dick Whorfs, Keenan Wynns, Hume Cronyns, Nancy Walker, Judy Garland, Van Johnson. There's always someone around to sing and play. And since none of them's at a loss for either ideas or language, they can talk the evening away with great content. Gene's friends note, however, that he's never so deep in talk that he doesn't know just where Betsy is. He'll wander over, drop a kiss on her hand or hair and go right on with the argument.

You'd be hard put to it to find a taste they didn't share. Both hate golf and love baseball. They like the same books, the same games, the same newspapers. They studied Spanish together, and now they're trying to get up a class to study Russian.

nothing important, darling . . .

Ask them what made the first year the hardest, and they'll eye you blankly. Gene recovers first. "If I'd married anyone else, there'd be a million things. Not with Betsy. She's so serene. Nothing bothers her—"

"What's there to bother me?"

"Well, I read too late—"

"All right, you read too late."

"Once I read till 7:30. You thought that was silly—"

"It is silly, but not when you do it. How about me? I mislay things—"

Once she left her ration books in the glove compartment of Van Johnson's car. They were having dinner that night with Van and Nancy Walker to celebrate Van's birthday. He tried to slip Betsy the books under the table, but Gene caught them. Chin in hand, he regarded his wife. "What did I ever marry you for?"

Next day he went off to Columbia—where he's on loan for "Cover Girl"—inadvertently taking her car keys along with his own. At noon she was on the phone. "Nothing important, darling. Just, what did I ever marry you for?"

There is also the hat question. Gene has a flair for women's clothes and yearns to see Betsy in ravishing hats. Any hat on her head makes her feel like a snared pigeon. Ever hopeful, he buys them, and she doesn't wear them. Last winter they were going to New York to see her folks. His Christmas gift was to be a fur coat for the trip. As a fillip to this lovely surprise, he designed a little fur hat to go with it, and took his creation to various shops—where they gave him that here's-a-sucker look and told him what was wrong with the hat. In the end, he found an appreciative soul who respected his genius and made the thing the way he wanted it. Betsy wore it to the station and as far as Pasadena, and that was the last time he saw it on her head.

"I did wear it," she protests. "Once last year, and once this."

A few weeks ago he thought he'd found the solution. A beret. She'd love a beret. They were casual and cute. But it had to be right. Not too floppy, like most of them. He scoured the town and finally found it at Bullocks—the ideal shape, the ideal shade of brown for her coloring.

"It's beautiful, Gene," she said. "Only—"

"Only what?"

"Well—I don't know when I'll wear it."

At that point he gave up.

He's got a temper but he never gets mad at Betsy. Bad manners rile him. Take the modern classic example—the guy who sees you make for a parking spot and cuts in ahead of you. Then he really explodes—jumps out, arms flailing, Irish vocabulary unleashed. What makes Betsy mad are people talking in the movies behind her. Gene gives this the haha. "Mad like a butterfly. She turns round, gives with the appealing smile and says, 'Please.'"

At Gene's first preview, Betsy got so excited she cried. "Thousands Cheer," his latest, was recently released. It belongs to Kathryn Grayson and to Gene. In it, he picks up where he left off in "Me and My Gal" and goes on—a long way—from there. We don't know whether Betsy cried at this one or not, but thousands cheered.

If you were born in Taurus (April 21-May 21)

Love: Glamour near home till August, especially powerful May 5-29. Great popularity starting July 26 for about a year: love and social life swell, with a high point Aug. 11-Sept. 3.

Family: Opportunity centered in home, family life till July 26, especially around June. You may change your locale here, get off to a new start in an altered environment.

Employment: Steady work likely; whatever is done consistently benefits you. Unselfishness pays high dividends. Progress via routine leads to recognition, success.

Travel: Short trips in April, May; longer ones, or more permanent removals, in June, late October, November. But don't be jumpy: nearby things demand attention especially after June.

Report says that Marine students under Lt. Tyrone Power learn more in two weeks from him than they learn in months from anyone else. Ty's horoscope shows success in the armed forces. This year increases his popularity and his luck. Change around the end of May starts the ball rolling for him in a new direction. Something about love or children takes stage center in his life. Anyone heard any reports that Annabella is expecting? Could be, this year.

Even though Alice Faye Harris is looking forward to a blessed event, it looks like trouble for her and Phil. Starts in late March, early April, gains speed in late June and becomes decisive soon after. It's possible that this will take some form other than a split—divorce isn't the only trouble a married couple can have—but if they survive together this bearing down of the planets, nothing will ever break them up. But will they?

If you were born in Gemini (May 22-June 21)

Love: Glamour catches hold for a long stay. Romance and good times are a permanent part of your life. Marriage chances increase after July. Have fun, look for lasting ties.

Family: New home conditions in latter half of the year make for happiness. Could mean a home of your own.

Employment: You'll work hard for what you get, but can win by persistence. New start in routine matters in October-November should be grasped confidently.

Travel: The most permanent thing about your life seems to be change. Be ready for anything. Trips, new starts, new locales especially likely in June-July.

Johnny (Gemini) Payne leads the male 20th Century fan mail poll, doesn't seem to get less popular in '44. Fact is, he can zoom in the service, may turn up with a medal. He has courage, the capacity to take chances and get away with it. Danger at the end of May, end of July, through September, bears watching.

Paulette Goddard's secret heart may make her Mrs. Secret Heart this year. She's under very magnetic influences, can charm 'em plenty. She's also got lots of luck developing now, which can bring her financial stability for a long time. Temperament can trip her at the end of June; before the luck comes, there's a chance for her to stymie it, lose heavily by indiscreet, badly-timed flare-ups.

Errol Flynn's troubles won't be over till after March, and actually, till after the end of June, he has to watch his step. Then it's smoother sailing with less of the limelight on unpleasant things. He can get back in the chips this year by conservative means, but has to look out for financial loss if he lets his impulses run away with him. He's going to have a tough time settling down, but apparently makes the effort in the last six months of the year. The house in Mexico will cost him plenty, may prove a headache. Errol isn't stable enough yet to make a go of it, will cut and run from the settled estate probably in late November or December. Looks like globe-trotting, the cover-up of a serious heartache.

If you were born in Cancer (June 22-July 23)

Love: Take it seriously! You can attract older men, establish something sound and lovely. April-May find you magnetic; October-November can clinch things.

Family: Put down roots of your own, avoid being rutted in the past. Avoid discord at end of June in putting family relations on a new basis.

Employment: Decision right after Jan. 20 gives you a grip on routine. Everything's changing around you; stick-to-itiveness makes everything better. Changes of work, or attitude toward it, from Oct. 23 on, should be achieved discreetly.

Travel: Look for it after mid-July, especially through the end of August. A brief trip may lead to unexpected results.

Olivia de Havilland's got to make up her mind about something important. Love hold's stage center—she may think she's hurt before the end of March and crawl into her shell. She's awfully sensitive, anyway, and now her capacity for feeling misunderstood is tremendous. She'll decide this year whether to go on with pictures or not. She's got the making of a recluse, despite her romantic history. Marriage? That's hard to say. She's a very complex little person, doesn't know what she wants or how to get it.

If you were born in Leo (July 24-August 23)

Love: You can get what you want this year, especially May 23-July 12. A friend may turn into a sweetheart swiftly, with lasting results.

Family: Relatives, neighbors, those close by are important; but home-life isn't the most important thing to you now. You make and achieve happiness by being unselfish with those who share your daily life.

Employment: Big chances for gain after July, through things done quietly, without boasting. Even if your role seems behind-the-scenes, results are worth it.

Travel: Frequent short trips likely, long ones not. Change, October-November, may bring removal to a nearby place, for keeps or at least for a long time.

Bob Taylor's health needs watching, January-June, and especially at the end of March. Danger from accidents and to the heart is present. He's a natural leader, has plenty of daring, can lack judgment when courage or ego is challenged. Bob's sense of duty and personal worth are terrific, a combination that makes him a strong fighter, a brave leader, a daring and effective pilot. He can win equally as much glory in service as on the screen.

If you were born in Virgo (July 24-August 23)

Love: gets more important this year; you acquire lasting friends after June, are magnetic (July-August), can find real love Aug. 11-Sept. 3. Be ready for happiness!

Family: Leadership is expected of you in your circle.

If you seem over-burdened, look on responsibility as opportunity. Establish your duties, stick to them, avoid rebellion, breaks, temper especially after Nov. 25.

Employment: Swell opportunities to progress, achieve recognition, success. Luck smiles especially after July. Take the lead, win friends, influence people and stabilize bank account. Chances to do all are numerous, the influences benefiting you stable and enduring.

Travel: Restlessness (July 13-Aug. 29) should be used up in a vacation trip. A short journey (Oct.-Nov.) can lead to unexpected change.

Virgo-born have zoomed in '43; five Virgo's were top-flight stars in '43, only one in '42. Leading them all was Alan Ladd, getting more fan mail than Valentino in his prime. Alan has long-lasting glamour influences at work for him, can hold his fame and popularity. But he's facing danger till March, when the most critical aspect in his chart is repeated where it influences him directly. That's crucial. Accidents menace him; he's got to watch his judgment, which can be faulty at critical times.

Ingrid Bergman and George Montgomery were born the same year, month, and day, according to the best information we can get. Both have lots of luck this year, especially in the last four months.

George, reported on duty in the Pacific northwest, is delayed and apparently held back till after mid-January. Then it looks like travel and far places.

Donald O'Connor's jitterbug career is probably over. Very likely it's the armed forces for him—he's just 18—and the end of his movie career. Might marry that alleged high school fiancée suddenly toward the end of July. Don's got the makings of a great fighter, should get in the thick this year.

Van Johnson's accident last April 1 could be the subject of an article all by itself. If he escaped the terrific planetary influences operating then, he can live forever, even though it did make him 4-F. Van's looking for his ideal woman, and it's not an easy search. He wants perfection. Look hard around the end of July, Van—maybe you won't have to be lonesome any more. If it isn't Judy Garland, look for an older girl. Van has the makings of a great dramatic actor, will start bigger roles soon.

If you were born in Libra (September 24-October 23)

Love: Libra is glamour and love, and now it's emphasized by very favorable influences. Keep ideals high to get what you want and hold it. June-July, and Sept.-Oct., find you irresistible.

Family: You incline to be self-centered, must be ready to take on responsibility after the end of June. Look out for resentments, bad judgment June 20-July 5. Elders may look to you for a lot: Be happy to do your share and maybe even more—it's your way to happiness, even if obligations seem to cramp you.

Employment: Look for betterment after July 26, for swift-developing chances July 13-Aug. 30, for gain Oct. 14-Nov. 25.

Travel: Expect anything; far places hold widening opportunity. Jan. 20-Mar. 28 can take you almost anywhere. Be progressive, don't get into a rut—the essence of your development is found in change leading to increased standing and prestige, perhaps far from where you start.

Greer Garson should be lovelier than ever, go on to new highs of popularity—she's likely to become the first lady of the screen and hold the place for a long time. The latter half of the year is difficult for her, may require her to drop everything for something dear to her in personal life. She values her love for Richard Ney above anything, will go to him without hesitancy if he needs her, and he may.

If you were born in Scorpio (October 24-November 22)

Love: A friend may become a sweetheart (Sept. 29-Nov. 25)—you can meet someone through relatives who'll be important if you're taking your emotions seriously.

Family: Change in family status can widen your scope, bring you new opportunity and advantages, though you may feel more "on your own" than before after the end of July. Don't keep expecting too much from elders.

Employment: You gain through cooperative effort, via chances coming Jan. 20-Mar. 27. Those whose opinions count favor you May, June, July. Seek added prestige, popularity, responsibility. Good things come your way if you keep conscience clear, self-respect high.

Travel: Need to stand on your own two feet takes you to far places where there's opportunity after the end of June. Your world enlarges—grasp opportunities to "Go places and do things" confidently.

Roy Rogers is going great guns, seeing new parts of the world and riding the crest of a wave of popularity, especially after the middle of the year. A woman is important in his life and helps his luck immeasurably this year. Good year for Roy to buy property for long-term holding; a new start at the end of the year gives him a push in the right direction.

If I have Hedy Lamarr's correct birth data, 1944-5 are crucial years in her life, bringing big change and a new viewpoint. Her temperament can break out in strange places, and with her naturally bad marriage indexes, she may be gracing Reno or some similar center of the 5th Freedom. Money runs through her fingers; she has to look out for debt, sponging friends and hare-brained financial schemes that appeal to her get-rich-quick impulses.

If you were born in Sagittarius (November 23-December 21)

Love: Feet-on-the-ground till June prevent costly breaks, keep you calm for glamour to come later. Idealistic tie can claim you May 23-July 12, can lead to swift, glamorous marriage and a new life for you. But look before you leap—don't marry just to get away from something you don't think you like!

Family: You're likely to be resenting all kinds of restraints till the end of June. Elders seem harsh—but take it and like it! Your opportunity to "be yourself" comes later: don't hurry it rebelliously.

Employment: Opportunity zooms after June; take on new responsibility, aim for a new high of prestige, earning power. Favor of important folks is yours May 23-Aug. 29 if you don't let ego and temperament put you in a false light.

Travel: Distant places beckon May 23-July 12; take trips, perhaps establish yourself permanently elsewhere. Avoid jumpiness, fickleness of purpose—wherever you go, have some purpose bigger than just plain adventure; thus make adventure mean something lasting.

Mrs. Harry James is slated to be just Betty Grable again before the end of 1944, according to the way I read the planets' influence in her chart and Harry's. Plenty of glamour surrounded both of them when they were married last July, but by mid-1944 the sober realities of life have cracked down, and it looks splittish, even though a little James is on the way. Too bad. Neither chart is too good for marriage, and there's more pressure on them than they're likely to take together.

Frank Sinatra's a Sagittarian who's skyrocketed in '43. He won't hold the peak he does now, for the englamoring influence passes. Hope he's saved his money—but it wasn't till August that "Frank Sinatra owned Frank Sinatra 100%." Till then, his partners, bosses, promoters and managers took most of what he made, typical of the influence that splot-lighted partners in the lives of Sagittarians. Frank's a lot more stable than his sanctified sex-appeal career, will be better off in every way when the smoke clears, and he isn't quite so magnetic. He may not make so much money, but he'll prosper financially, be better able to enjoy life.

If you were born in Capricorn (December 22-January 20)

Love: Best social periods are Jan. 29-Feb. 21, and Oct. 14-Dec. 11. This isn't a glamour-year for you, but there's a chance for a good, permanent tie after the end of June, if you're grown-up enough to value what's offered then.

Family: Peculiar conditions with elders, who'll either expect a lot of you or swing to the other extreme and tend to spoil you. Be a mature, responsible member of the family group; an adult can benefit you tremendously.

Employment: Regular daily chores develop past the drudgery-point, lead to recognition, advancement. Better yourself in connection with work Jan.-Mar. 28, assume more responsibility along cooperative lines.

Travel: Swift developments in June-July can take you far, cause a kind of break with the past. Be courageous, grasping new opportunities at a distance, without quarreling with those you may be leaving behind. July 13-Aug. 29 good for trips, removals.

Judy Garland takes on responsibility—we bet it's a husband. She takes her men, and herself, seriously. Reports that her dates with Van Johnson are for dancing, only we put in the raised eyebrow department. Their temperaments are alike; both are lonely at heart, show very similar backgrounds and psychological conditioning. Sure, they can hurt each other—probably will. But there must be deep understanding and sympathy between them, and there's a better than even chance that, having got acquainted, they'll click. Basically, both are afraid of being hurt, but may discover in each other precisely the safe refuge they seek.

If you were born in Aquarius (January 21-February 19)

Love: Good stable influences heighten your popularity and magnetism throughout this year; restrictions drop off after the end of June. You're slated to get something that'll make you very happy. Engagement, marriage before end of July makes you even happier than you'd dreamed. You're especially favored Feb. 13-Mar. 17, and May 30-June 22.

Family: Your individualism doesn't think much along family lines this year; sweethearts, relatives at a distance, are more important than those close by. Make sure you don't hurt those you love most by neglect.

Employment: Routine won't appeal to you till after the end of June; then you'll find that your continued happiness depends on consistency. Look for practical ways to lead your own life in the last six months of the year, by taking on regular duties soberly.

Travel: comes easy to you; you seem to take it for granted, can spend lots of time moving from place to place. Opportunity lies afar, even though it entails a lot of hard, consistent work. Go places and broaden your outlook.

That baby of Lana Turner's came just in time to worry everyone. Born in Leo, sign opposite her mother's, she came just a week before an eclipse, and it wasn't till the day after the eclipse that little Cheryl was pronounced out of danger. Lana's got a swell year ahead; she goes right on, works hard, and everyone keeps right on loving her. Health complications in June, July, August tell her to slow down, rest. If she doesn't she can make unhappiness for herself. Love's important for Lana, but low vitality this year can cause temperament and trouble which by common-sense moderation she can avoid. I can't get Steve's birth data, but if Lana's chart is any index, and it probably is, their marriage should last.

Capt. Ronald Reagan, U. S. A., is rarin' to go. He's doing important work where he is near home, but in some way seems to be in the thick of things December 1943-January 1944. Maybe just an extra press of work that finds him in the middle, but it looks like action of some kind.

If you were born in Pisces (February 20-March 20)

Love: You'll have to take yourself seriously this year, to benefit by the social-love influences. Jitterbugging won't bring out the best in you; but there's a chance for the Real Thing, especially after July 26. Be alert to chances for engagement, marriage.

Family: Changes at home start popping right after January; you or your family may move. Whatever has been looking like a restraint seems to be removed; elders are easier to deal with. Strike out on your own—you might even be starting a home of your own!

Employment: Excellent chances Jan. 20-July 26, especially May 23-July 12, bring progress, gain. Assume responsibility in your job, to benefit by expanding chances later.

Travel: Change can mean travel, and since change in home-life, fundamentals, is likely, you can look for travel, a new locale for your home and family. A long trip Oct. 14-Nov. 25 is excellent.

Betty Hutton has marriage highlighted this year, though it may be no more than an off-again, on-again proposition. Her career takes a new turn; she seems to get more mature and serious-minded, can surprise everyone by doing roles of depth and importance. She's got a touch of genius, has Betty, and great self-assurance. Watch health, last part of the year, Betty . . . and look out for gossip in November and December.

projection room where he spent day after day reviewing old Clark Gable pictures. The studio wants Jimmie to learn to emulate the Gable voice.

Brass Buttons:

By the time you read this, Alan Ladd will be wearing tweeds instead of khaki and preparing to make your hearts gLadd with more characterizations as deft as those in "This Gun For Hire" and "The Glass Key." The serious recurrence of difficulties caused by old swimming injuries bedded him, first, in a hospital near his Army base. Later he was moved to a second hospital where he could be given more specialized medical attention. Sue, frantic, of course, left Hollywood immediately to remain with him. At present it is not known whether surgery will have to be undertaken or not. The only certain thing is that he has been given an honorable discharge from the Army.

"You can't, no you can't, no you really, really can't, oh, you can't get them up in the morning . . ." Reveille, kids, with hot licks in the sizzling Harry James manner.

In the barracks, bestirred by a boogie-woogie beat, foggy joes sat up and aimed an appreciative ear. "What a war," said one. "Getting bugled out of bed by Harry James!"

Yep, he was hep. The terrific trumpeter has recorded all of the Army bugle calls, and these are being used on all posts where recordings regulate the khaki life. However, when the first group was recorded, some of them were rejected and had to be done over again. Harry, who may some day soon be awakened by his own music, thought that the rejection might have been caused by his mild addition of a few jam session passages. Investigation indicated that even the colonel was a brother under the tin—he liked the variations as well as any ex-gator in the Army. The difficulty was entirely in the technicalities of the waxing.

So, on the set of "Two Sisters and a Sailor," the Pied Piper of Pin-Up Girls re-recorded several of the bugle calls before an appreciative audience of officers from nearby Army posts.

Music has charms to Sousa savage beast.

You know Christmas: It arrived October 15 this year. Or at least the holly, red ribbons, packages, greeting cards and racked brains did. Paulette Goddard solved her overseas gift problem by logic: Q: What would make a man, overseas, happy at Christmas time?

A: A real Christmas, with comradeship and laughter.

Q: How does one send comradeship and laughter in a package weighing not more than five pounds?

A: By sending something that will enhance the man's popularity.

So Paulette sent Burgess Meredith a huge box of vitamin pills to keep him healthy, and four pair of nylons (her last) with six lipsticks (different shades) to make him popular.

There is a chap on Hollywood Boulevard who will tell you that Captain Clark Gable is one of the finest characters on earth. This chap has long earned his living by making briar pipes. Along came the war with the result that his shipment of briars from England was stopped.

But recently he received a parcel from Captain Gable, who had been a peace-time customer; the parcel contained enough briars for many, many pipes, so the chap is flourishingly in business again.

Dinah Shore is now addressing all those "Corporal George Montgomery Letz" letters to an A.P.O. number, probably one trimmed with fur. George had one idea and one alone when he was inducted: to get overseas as soon as possible, preferably to some post where his knowledge of languages would be useful. He excels at Russian especially.

He was blond and dashing. He wore the slate blue uniform and the gallant cardinal cap of the Fighting French. From his expression it was obvious that he was concerned with his own thoughts, hence utterly oblivious to the interested glances of strollers along New York's Fifth Avenue. Suddenly a sub-jitterbug stepped up and said, "Excuse me, M'sieu, but may I have your autograph?"

That started it. In a few moments Jean Pierre Aumont was the astonished vortex of a circle of laudatory fans. It was his last day in New York. The day before he had kept a promise to Universal, by putting Maria Montez Aumont on a Hollywood-bound train.

When Maria arrived in Hollywood, however, she had a roaring case of influenza, caused partly by change of climate, partly by her previously heavy picture schedule and partly by her wretchedness over Jean Pierre's departure for a combat area.

The Domestic Scene:

His head was bent. He walked slowly about. His dark eyes scanned the expanse of the sound stage with great concentration. "Any luck today?" someone asked.

Our hero pursed his lips. "One this morning," he admitted, but added with a sigh, "none this afternoon."

"Any contributions?" the friend queried further.

Mr. Charles Boyer turned back the lapel of his coat to reveal four safety pins. "The script girl gave me two yesterday," he said.

Explanation: When the Boyers bought the layette for their youngster (due in December), they remembered to buy everything, but everything, except safety pins.

So prospective-papa Boyer has been collecting pins from every possible source. Trying to buy them in Los Angeles is like trying to buy an excursion ticket to Biarritz.

Ingrid Bergman's five-year-old daughter, Pia, was a recent visitor to the set of "Gas light" where she incited the crew to riotous laughter. Someone asked Miss Pia if she wanted to be an actress when she grew up. "No," she said definitely, "I want to be a director like Mr. George Cukor, because a director is the only person who can tell my mother what to do and she will mind."

Somewhat later she was seated comfortably on a ladder, watching the filming of a very difficult scene. In the midst of the take, Miss Pia—who had watched her mother in a certain pose studying her script the night before—piped shrilly, to the utter destruction of the sound track, "You're not doing it right, Mother. You're supposed to be lying on your tummy on the bed when you speak those lines."

Director Pia was hustled off to the confines of her mother's dressing room.

Bette Davis, thinner, quieter, but obviously enjoying her work, has told everyone in the studio how delighted she is that Claude Rains was given the role of Mr. Skeffington. Paul Henreid was originally set, but refused to do it because he felt that he wasn't right for the part. Finally the part came back to Rains, who was on the Warner lot under contract, a fact that Bette had pointed out repeatedly.

Gowned in one of the frilly dresses of the period, Bette was chatting with a set visitor between takes. Something about a magazine article entered the conversation, and Bette said naturally, "Farney was such a lot of fun when I was working on that. He and the writer and I spent a lot of time together. He kidded the life out of both of us." Her tone was entirely natural. Once again, as she has before, Bette appears to have accepted a major event of her life with a courage which has extracted the sweetness from memory and left all bitterness to those of smaller heart and narrower vision.

This department, striving as it does to bring happiness to all, has a super-duper announcement to make. It has to do with "Shoulders" Johnson, otherwise known as Van, a sterling character who is to tweeds what Frank Sinatra is to a microphone: a swoon-maker.

Recently a group were having luncheon in the Metro commissary, and someone kidded Van about a girl he admired. Van, grinning, admitted that he had been squiring an aggregation of lovelies. But, he added, it was all part of a system. He really wanted to meet the right girl, fall genuinely in love and get married. "That's the only real happiness," he asserted sincerely. "That's the way to live."

around on all the big hook-ups. They're not kidding about this being a real filmusical. . . Jack Haley plays the same part in the movie that he did in the Rodgers and Hart Broadway production of "Higher and Higher" back around 1941. This is definitely a pre-war affair. No tears or worries, just wise-cracking by Haley at his best and swoon stuff by Sinatra. . . . It's Michele Morgan's first comedy in this country, and Frank's first crack at acting. He did appear in a picture recently singing with T. Dorsey's band, but gosh, in this, he walks, talks and sings, too, all for the same admission price! . . . We've got a Cinderella in Barbara Hale. She started out as a model in Chicago and has only been in pictures a quick six months, doing bit parts. In "Higher and Higher" she not only got the second feminine lead, but gets to kiss Sinatra, marry him, 'n everythin'! . . . Tim Whalen, the director, is getting himself a reputation as a perfect jinx—the nice kind this time. The man's positively psychic as far as picking out talent goes. He's the lad who discovered that Victor Mature was nothing short of a dream man, and a whole year ago, he cooked up this deal with Sinatra. If that isn't foresight 'r somethin'.

buy one, sir," Byngham said. "It's seven o'clock by the sundial."

"Mike!" Mr. Drake yelled. "Get this man out of here."

Mike O'Brien sat up sleepily on the other enormous bed in Mr. Drake's bedroom and rubbed his eyes. He looked at Byngham and nodded.

"O. K. Byngie," he said. "He's up now. I'll take over."

Byngham nodded imperturbably. He crossed to the door and lifted Cyrus Drake's jacket from the floor. He dusted it off carefully. Reaching through the pickets he extracted matchbooks that showed that Mr. Drake had visited, in succession, the previous night, the Club Gala, Happy House, The Tombstone, The Pelican Club, the Bit O' Paree and Lefty Houston's Third Avenue Bar and Grill. He also extracted a letter. The letter was still sealed.

"The letter, sir," Byngham said. "I've been telling you about it every night for a month. It is still unopened."

"Well, mail it," Drake said. "What am I paying you for?"

"It was mailed," Byngham said. "It was mailed to you."

"Terrible service," Drake said. "I'll have to talk to the O. P. A."

Mike said: "Leave it there. I'll take care of it now."

When Byngham left, Mike got up a little groggily and picked up the letter.

"Want me to read it?" Mike said.

Cyrus Drake sat up in bed once more, shook himself thoroughly and said: "Business before pleasure. Read it."

The letter contained two paragraphs. The first one, in words of three syllables or more, made a point about bankruptcy.

"It means," Mike said pleasantly, "that you're broke. In a word, washed up!"

"Oh," said Cyrus Drake; he slid back to the pillow again. "Wake me up in a half hour."

At eight o'clock promptly, Cyrus Drake rose, dressed carefully and walked down the gilt and gold staircase of his New York mansion, crossed a small hall and entered the baronial dining room lit for dinner. The dining room, that is, was lit. He inspected the long, beautiful table for a moment and then decisively walked to the swinging doors that led to the spacious kitchen.

"You are all invited," he said to the servants, "to dine with me tonight."

That is exactly how it happened that Mickey and Marty, footman and first maid, Hilda, the upstairs maid, Byngham, the butler, Mrs. Whiffen, the cook, Millie, the slavey, Oscar, the chauffeur, Mike O'Brien, valet extraordinary, and Sandy, the social secretary, happened to dine with Cyrus Drake one spring evening.

At the dinner table, Cyrus made a short speech and to the point: "Friends," he said, "I'm broke. The bank says so. They added up all the numbers, and it came out minus."

Marty said: "All the dough that's been in the family all these years!"

"What are we going to do now?" Hilda asked.

"Yes," Drake said, picking at the food, "what are we going to do now?"

Mike O'Brien said: "Wait a minute. Wait a minute. I got an idea."

Byngham said: "We can use one."

"The Drake name is still money in the bank. Top drawer. Best in New York. Now if he had a daughter—"

"I have one," Drake said.

"You have one!"

"She's with my wife."

"Where's your wife?"

"There are some questions," Drake said, "that I leave alone. Last heard from, she was in Switzerland."

"What's her name?"

"Pamela."

"Now if Pamela Drake were in town," Mike said excitedly, "she'd be able to hook herself a guy and a million bucks in no time at all. She'd be terrific."

"But," Byngham groaned, "we don't know where Pamela Drake is."

ersatz daughter . . .

"So what?" Mike said. "That's fine. Neither does anyone else. Now just suppose—" his eye traveled over the table; from Mickey to Sandy, from Hilda to Mrs. Whiffen and then finally to Millie, the slavey, looking up at him excitedly. "Now just suppose," he said, "that Millie became Pamela Drake!"

The plan was so simple, it was fantastic. Mike O'Brien took over the job of making Millie into Pamela Drake, debutante, heiress of the Drake millions.

Millie was beautiful. Under the drab of the servant girl's costume was pure gold. Transformed, Millie was a willow, poised and beautiful; dressed in the best Fifth Avenue had to offer, she was breathtaking; coiffed, manicured, shining, she was a pure joy to the eyes.

Mike O'Brien stood back and looked at her: "Wonderful," he said. "Now remember. Who are you?"

"Millie."

"No," Mike said. "Pamela Drake."

"Yes, Mike."

"Put a little more enthusiasm into it. Don't you want to be Pamela Drake?"

"I don't know, Mike," she said slowly.

"Why not?" Mike groaned.

Sandy said: "Maybe she's in love."

"With whom?" Mike said. "I never saw any guys around."

"Well," Sandy said, "maybe it's the guy next door. It's a possibility."

"What guy?" Mike said.

"She waves to him every night through the window."

"Yes, he's nice," Millie said.

"Who is he?" Mike said.

Just then the door bell rang. It was a young man, a little thin, with large, pleading eyes. There was something very appealing about him. He was carrying a bouquet of flowers. The servants gathered around him curiously. But when he saw Millie, he walked toward her boyishly and extended the flowers.

"You haven't waved the past few days," he said. "I thought you were ill."

"Is this the guy?" Mike said.

"Yes," Millie said. "That's him."

"Who are you?" Mike said.

The fellow grinned at him modestly: "I'm Frank Sinatra."

Mickey, the upstairs maid, fainted.

"Sinatra," Sandy said faintly.

"Thank you for the flowers," Millie said.

"Not at all, Miss—Miss—"

Mike O'Brien yelled: "Pamela Drake. She's Pamela Drake. Millie's just a nickname."

"Oh," Frank said, puzzled. "Funny, I thought she just worked here. I was going to ask her to wear the flowers to the Butlers' Ball. My chambermaid invited me to sing there."

"Oh, I'd love to go to the Butlers' Ball."

Mike said desperately: "Of course, you're going. You're one of the patrons. Don't you remember they invited you to sponsor it this year—"

Millie said: "What?"

Mike said hurriedly: "So long, Frank. Glad you dropped in. See you at the Ball." He opened the door and almost pushed the pleasant young man out.

The Butlers' Ball glittered sedately in one of the fanciest ballrooms of one of New York's biggest, handsomest hotels. In the boxes that lined the balcony two groups eyed each other rather hostilely. In one of the patron's boxes, Millie sat splendidly, flanked by Cyrus Drake on one side and by Mike O'Brien on the other. In the second of the two boxes, Katharine Keating, whose place as Number One Deb of the Year, had seemed secure until Pamela Drake had arrived, sat haughtily, flanked also: on one side, her mother; on her left a rather languid gentleman who went by the name of Sir Wilton Fitzroy Wilton, K. B., O. B. E.

Mike O'Brien leaned over and whispered in Millie's ear: "See that thin slice of corn by Keating's side? Take a good look at him. That's your next husband."

"But I don't even know him."

"A detail," Mike said. "That's the boy we're after."

bumpsi-daisy . . .

On the stage now, Frank Sinatra was singing, his voice almost caressing, soft, whispering of romance and moonlight. The orchestra played softly behind him, weaving a spell of magic around the melody. Katharine Keating and Sir Wilton rose to dance. Mike was on his feet.

"Come on," he said. "That's our cue. Here's where we meet Sir Wilton."

They circled the half darkened floor, and in Mike's arms, Millie looked up at his face. "I like to dance with you."

"Do you?" Mike said.

"Do you get that feeling?" Millie said. "You're walking on air. You're away from this world floating higher and higher."

"That's just Sinatra's voice," Mike said.

"Maybe," Millie said. "But maybe it's—"

Mike said tensely: "Now!"

He twirled her out and, caught by surprise, Millie almost stumbled. She tried to recover. One leg went out awkwardly; a shoe flew off. She spun once more and crashed into a man's arms. Sir Wilton looked at her in amazement.

"How charming you Americans are," said Sir Wilton. "How utterly charming."

And that was how Pamela Drake happened to meet Sir Wilton.

After that, events moved swiftly. It was odd how simple everything was. Sir Wilton was almost jelly each time he saw Millie. And he did see her again, several times. He saw her at the Debutantes Dansant when Millie was voted Number One Deb of the Year. Everything went wonderfully. It was only a matter of time until he proposed.

And Mike O'Brien saw to it that Sir Wilton got his chance to propose. He arranged a party at the Drake mansion.

half a love . . .

"This is the big night, kid," he said to Millie. "This is when we collect on all the bets. This is the payoff."

"You think he'll propose tonight?"

"If he doesn't, you can put me in a corner and call me dopey," Mike said.

When he left, Millie stood despondently by the window. Someone came into the room and sat down at the piano. It was Frank Sinatra. Frantically, she motioned to him to come outside and meet her. He looked at her, puzzled. Then he understood, nodded yes. Millie slipped out the back door, hurriedly. She thought no one saw her, but Mickey standing in the shadow of the stairs, saw her go out.

"Frank," Millie said to Frank Sinatra, "you've got to help me."

"Sure," Frank said.

"Were you ever in love?"

"Well," Frank said. "Well, no. Not yet."

"I am," Millie said.

"That's fine," Frank said.

"The man I love wants me to get married."

Frank said, "Good fellow."

"He wants me to get married to someone else."

"What?" Frank said. "Say that again."

They had come down the street and into the park. Under the soft lights a night wind whispered between the trees. The music welled up, and Frank's soft voice took up the refrain. Then out of the darkness, Mike O'Brien came storming.

"Listen, you imitation bird," he said heatedly. "What are you doing out here?"

"I asked him," Millie said.

"Well, ask me to take you back. Sir Wilton's burning up waiting for you."

"Mike," Millie said softly, pleadingly, "do you want me to marry him?"

"Sure," Mike said harshly. "And that's all I want. Let's get away from this spurious sparrow. Come on."

"Thanks, Frank," Millie said.

And that night, on schedule, Sir Wilton proposed to Millie. Millie accepted.

The day of the wedding was a little sultry. Clouds lined the sky over the skyscrapers of New York. But in the Drake mansion, all was excitement. In the upstairs boudoir they were getting Millie ready for the ceremony. Downstairs, Sir Wilton paced up and down languidly looking at his watch. Mike looked everything over for a last O. K. and then raced upstairs to check on Millie. When he got to the boudoir, he found Mickey and Sandy but no Millie.

"Where is she?"

"Up in the attic," Sandy said.

"What is she doing there?"

"You know the old rhyme. Something old, something blue— She's trying to dig it up."

"No time for that," Mike said.

He went up to the attic. The great room was musty and dark. Through a high window, the sunlight came spattering the old wooden floor with gold. Old chests, dusty and hidden, lined the sides; in one corner an old music box stood, still waiting patiently to play its tinkling minuet. Across the room, caught in a shaft of sunlight, Mike saw Millie.

"Hey," he said softly. "Millie. You're beautiful."

She looked up, seeing him: "Am I?"

"Wonderful," he said.

a woman's privilege . . .

She came toward him walking a little sadly. When she passed the music box she lifted the lid curiously. The old gay music spilled out. She laughed, and she was going to drop the lid.

"Wait, let it play," Mike said. "It's music for you. Dance?"

They waltzed slowly around the musty old attic. Mike was looking down at her softly, fondly, holding her gently.

"You don't want to marry Sir Wilton," he said, "do you?"

"No, Mike. Not really."

"You don't have to," he said. "I didn't know it before. I can't make you do it."

There was a clatter of steps on the attic floor, and Byngham, Drake and Marty broke in.

"We thought you ran out on us," Byngham said. "Sir Wilton's suspicious."

"Let him," Mike said. "Millie isn't going to marry him."

"What!" Byngham yelled.

"Listen," Mike said harshly. "The kid's in love. We can't make her marry him."

"We need the money," Byngham said.

"Millie's going to get married to the guy she loves," Mike said. "To Frank Sinatra."

Behind Mike an open dumbwaiter shaft yawned. Marty yanked Millie and started her out of the attic. Mike moved. But not quickly enough. Byngham was even quicker. He pushed. And Mike tumbled into the waiting dumbwaiter.

running interference . . .

Tumbling out of the dumbwaiter at the bottom of the shaft, Mike found himself in a large room that he had never seen before. It was a huge panelled room; in one corner was a tremendous fireplace. One wall was lined with wine racks. Mike reached for a bottle curiously, blew the dust off, read the label.

Then suddenly he understood. There had once been a tavern on the site of the Drake Mansion, back almost in the days of New Amsterdam. The meaning of the whole thing dawned on him. The invaluable old furniture, the wines aged enough to be worth their weight in gold: money! Millie didn't have to marry Sir Wilton!

He realized suddenly that he could hear the whisper of voices. Checking, he found an open vent in the wall. The voice he heard was the voice of the preacher reading the marriage ceremony.

The voice droned: ". . . anyone who can show cause why these two people should not be joined in matrimony . . ."

If he could hear voices, Mike thought swiftly, they should be able to hear his.

He shouted: "There is cause. She isn't Pamela Drake. She's Millie. Just a servant!"

And he spilled out the story. He grinned as he heard the shouts of consternation wafting down to him through the wall vent. That stopped the wedding all right.

Stopped it cold!

So he was waiting for them when they broke into the room, Byngham and Drake and Marty and all the others, fighting mad. But when he got through explaining to them about the old tavern, they calmed down.

Byngham said: "My apologies, old man. Stay here and take over this place for us. We can run it as a night club. You manage it."

"No," Mike said, "I'm pulling out now. Just tell Millie to be happy. With Frank—"

He walked out quickly before any of them had a chance to stop him. He walked out and left it all flat. He wanted to get away. Maybe he'd forget Millie, forget the girl with the large, lovely eyes and the charming smile. She wasn't for him. She was for another guy. Just pull up stakes, then; get away—

So it wasn't until two months later that the news came through to him that Frank Sinatra had married Katharine Keating. And when he heard it, he came raging back to New York, back to the Inn on the site of the old Drake mansion.

He found it full of charming people. It was a success, the biggest night club success in New York for a decade. It had an air, different, amusing. But he didn't stop to look at it. He was searching for a face, a smile. He walked swiftly through the room, through to the kitchen. He looked around. Over by the sink a familiar figure was hacking diligently at the dishes. Mike O'Brien grinned for the first time in two months.

"Millie!" he called.

And when she turned, he didn't need to know anything more. Everything he wanted to know was there in her eyes. He felt as if he were walking on air, floating higher and higher. That was love, wasn't it? Through the swinging doors of the kitchen he could hear the orchestra playing, and over it came the soft voice of Frank Sinatra singing of love and romance, moonlight and the touch of lips in the dark. But he didn't need Sinatra to tell him about love now. He didn't need anything.

All he needed was Millie.

We've got a war to win on the home front, too!

Sit down for a minute and think things over. Why are most people making more money today? It's because of the SAME cussed war that's killing and maiming some of the finest young folks this country ever produced.

So if anyone uses his extra money to buy things he's in no particular need of . . . if he bids against his neighbor for stuff that's hard to get and pushes prices up . . . well, sir, he's a WAR PROFITEER. That's an ugly name—but there's just no other name for it.

decided that he wanted to fight now, instead of waiting until he had finished his course. He met another chap who had reached the star salesman's position in one of the nation's most successful business organizations. Another man had been associated in business with his father and had been planning to be married—"but we decided to wait. Things may be pretty uncertain for me."

Gig kept still. He asked questions of others and listened attentively; about himself he said nothing. Finally he wandered out to the platform for a smoke and was joined by a tall, rangy character who said quietly, "Say, riding in this three-tiered bunk car is quite a come-down after traveling in a Flying Fortress, isn't it, Captain?"

Gig took it easy. "How do you mean?" he temporized.

kidding the captain . . .

"I saw 'Air Force' six times," the boot said. "Swell picture. You did a fine job. And I liked your getting promoted—right in the thick of things—from lieutenant to captain."

Gig grinned. "Yeah. It was a long picture," he said. "Do me a big favor, will you, please? Just don't say anything about this to the other guys. Okay?"

The boot surveyed Gig appreciatively. "Sure—if that's the way you want it."

Toward morning he awakened with a frightful jar. "Oakland," he thought. Cautiously he raised the blind a few inches to take a squint at his new base. . . . He noted the dry-bed river, the span of concrete bridges. He blinked. This was all oddly familiar. . . . Los Angeles! They were just pulling out at 3 A.M. . . . that meant at least 14 hours of travel and at least 5 more hours of blissful sleep.

Gig turned over and buried his face in the pillow with a grunt of contentment.

The following night he had his first experience with Navy regimentation. He fell in line behind a serpentine of boots, took a dinner tray and proffered it along the food-assembly queue. "That's no way to carry your tray, Mister," the bo'sun observed. "Turn it around."

But this was only a minor mishap, to be followed—as in the case of practically all boots—by bigger and better contretemps. One afternoon, on the drill field, the drill officer suggested that Gig take over the column and give the orders. Gig, with the extreme courtesy one uses toward a petty officer, protested that he didn't feel exactly able to put the boots through their paces yet.

"You'll get along swell," the officer said with about 40 times the confidence Gig felt. "I've got some business to attend to. Be back after awhile."

So Gig, assembling his vocabulary of orders, called the first: "Dress, right DRESS!" The men extended their arms and turned their heads to complete the maneuver. There they stood, finger tip to next man's shoulder, a very pretty sight. And there stood Gig, slowly turning to stone. He couldn't remember what to say to get them out of this position.

Days, weeks, centuries and eons passed. Gig knew that if he took a step forward he would fall flat over his long grey beard. At the moment when he was praying to be disintegrated by Buck Rogers or swooped out of the world by Superman, a buddy came to his rescue. In a stage whisper, he fed Gig his next line. A samaritan, brother, a pure, unadulterated samaritan in the flesh.

Palmer's SKIN SUCCESS OINTMENT

A movie was being shown at the base one night, but Gig asked permission to skip it as he had seen the feature previously. He wanted to do his laundry in solitude during the time when the other boots were attending the movie, he explained, so his request was granted by his immediate superior.

He was rushing down the corridor, one arm full of clothes, and a bottle of Clorox under the other, when a petty officer suddenly emerged from the chief's quarters. "Where are you going, mister?"

Gig explained.

"But you're supposed to be seeing a movie with the other men," the petty officer said coldly. "Who gave you permission to be absent?"

Naturally, Gig didn't want to get the subordinate officer into trouble if permission shouldn't have been granted, so he stumbled over a few words, mumbled a few syllables and started to extend one arm in a gesture of pure amnesia as to the officer's name.

The gesture was too wide; the bottle of Clorox, spurting a dozen small rivers of chemical, promptly crashed onto the "deck." Without a word, Gig and the officer darted to the far end of the corridor to get an armload of swabs to clean up the mess.

Vigorously they worked side by side. Some of the Clorox had even seeped under the chief's office door . . . luckily he wasn't there at the time. When the deck was dried, Gig was allowed to go on about his washing without further explanation. Oh, yes, he borrowed the Clorox belonging to another boot.

After Gig had completed his three months in boot camp, he knew he would be allowed an occasional week-end pass, so he sent for Sheila who joyously moved north. She finally found an apartment large enough to accommodate herself, the phonograph-recorder she couldn't force herself to store, and the few other things she and Gig really needed to set up wartime housekeeping. Then she settled down to being a Navy wife. She learned in the first two weeks that the greatest problem was loneliness.

If Gig didn't get home for two weeks, that meant day after day of cleaning an already spotless apartment; of cooking for one; of being remote from friends and familiar surroundings; of having too much time to think about her family, who are prisoners in the Philippines. She talked the situation over with another Navy wife with whom she had made friends.

"Why don't you get a job?" the friend asked.

"I'm not much of a commercial asset," confessed Sheila forlornly. "I've never worked, so I don't know a thing about an office."

"You could learn, couldn't you?" encouraged the friend. "It's no trick to learning filing or switchboard operation."

When her friend made an appointment for Sheila with the office manager of a defense plant, she filled out the application forms with a trembling hand and high hopes. The manager said, after scrutinizing Sheila, "I think we can use you. You strike me as being the sort of young woman who will get on well."

Sheila proved, in short order, that she was an exceptional wife in more ways than simply learning business routine in a rush. She has only one ration book, of course, because Gig isn't allowed extra points for his liberty periods. Producing three to five well-balanced meals for two, three, four or five persons every week-end requires ingenuity. The additional members of the Young family—in case you're curious—were acquired by Gig at the base. He couldn't resist bringing home an occasional boot who was lonely.

There was the case of the Sleep Walker. He was placed in an upper bunk, from which he fell with spine-jarring regularity. He took a good deal of kidding, some of it from Seaman Young. However, Gig awakened groggily one night, under the impression that he was at home and started to get up. That first step was a bad one.

The next day he suggested that the sleep walker be a Young house guest over the next week-end. "You can sleep on the couch and spare yourself some bruises," said the prospective host who had learned the hazards of an upper bunk.

With this descent of hungry service men upon her kitchen in mind, Sheila bought up a supply of macaroni and spaghetti. By adding fresh tomatoes, as much hamburger as her red coupons will afford, fresh or canned mushrooms and plenty of seasoning, she keeps a kettle of simmering stuff ready to blitz salty appetites.

Perhaps the greatest change to take place in the lives of Sheila and Gig is their return to comparative anonymity. They had just reached the stage in Hollywood, where they were generally recognized wherever they went. If "Old Acquaintance," the picture in which Gig does such a stratospheric job opposite Bette Davis, had been released before Gig left, he would really have been on the gravy train.

One night he was hitchhiking from the base to town and was picked up by an obviously well-to-do citizen of considerable culture and background. This citizen launched almost immediately into a description of his daughter. She had just appeared in a high school drama. "She's got the stuff. She's an actress, all right," said her fond father. "Why, she's remarkable! Do you know that she memorized 50 pages of script and NEVER FORGOT A LINE."

The father talked on. His daughter was going to a dramatic school next—then she would probably be trained in some little theater. "Provided she doesn't get married," said the father. "That girl will have her name in lights some day."

They drove on in silence for a few yards, then the man asked Gig, "What were you in civilian life?"

"An actor," said Gig.

The man regarded his passenger through pince-nez glasses. "That so? How did you get started?"

"When I was in high school I was in all the plays," Gig explained cautiously.

strictly the ticket . . .

The man cleared his throat after having given Gig another brief glance. "Well," he said comfortingly, "not everyone gets to be tops in that profession. It requires an extra something. Now, that girl of mine . . . she'll have her name in lights some day."

After Gig had thanked the gentleman for the ride, he stood on the corner and watched the sedan roll down the street. "Your name in lights," he said thoughtfully, grinning to remember the watts he had been given for "Air Force."

He adjusted his white cap; he straightened his shoulders. He looked down at his navy blue arm. "Brother," he said, "it's going to be a great day when I get that red chevron and that crow on my sleeve. Yes, sir, a great day. Pharmacist's mate, third class. For Byron Barr, at this time of life, it's strictly the ticket."

THE MEN I LOVE

you an official star, like Astaire or Boyer."

The troupe stopped at Washington and sped by taxi to a restaurant. No, they couldn't be served—too many persons waiting ahead of them. They rushed to a second restaurant, to a third, a fourth. Their train was scuffing its heels and snorting with impatience to get away, so the troupe rushed back to the station. Without food. Or water. On they chugged through the hot and muggy afternoon.

At length they reached their station and were taken to a small hotel. It was too late to have dinner. There was but one restaurant in town, and that was closed for the night. It had been 18 hours since any one of the travelers had eaten a bite. Betty struggled upstairs, famished and exhausted, and looked at herself in the mirror. All the curl had slid out of the artificial bangs, and they hung on her nose like a Shetland Pony's mane drips over his forehead.

It was too, too much. Uttering a wail, Betty collapsed on the bed and had hysterics. So Doris was enlivened by the thought of the corner grocery . . . in a few minutes she returned with a can of milk and a box of shredded wheat biscuits. Betty ate four and went to sleep for 12 hours.

The next morning the girls and their escort were collected by the hospitality committee from a nearby camp and jolted over the scenery in a jeep. They started out, crisp and toothsome as spring lettuce in their spic cotton dresses. Their powder, rouge and lipstick was applied in a way to make G. I. haircuts curl. Oh yes, and those glorious artificial bangs were crinkled and set in place as neat as the fringe on a bright new awning.

The jeep careened, casting up dust. The sun beat down, bringing forth perspiration. The wind blew, trying out encircling movements. By the time the girls arrived at camp, the bangs strongly resembled the twiggy flotsam tossed up by the Mississippi after a flood. "The heck with it," said Betty. "Glamour is a snare and a delusion. From now on it's going to be just the kid herself."

The kid herself did all right. She lost her voice every day because of the abandon with which she entertained the boys. Then, at night when she should have been getting sleep, her hotel room sounded like the inside of a cave during a rock slide because of the uninterrupted knocking. Everyone who could walk in tricornered pants or with two canes wanted an autograph.

She and Doris, after three such nocturnal experiences, perfected a plan. Doris always occupied the room assigned by the hotel clerk to Betty, and vice versa. Doris would open the door and hold a slim forefinger to her lips. "Miss Hutton is in another part of the hotel—asleep. You'd better be quiet or you'll awaken her, even on the next floor. Besides, the rest of the guests are complaining, and you know that if we get thrown out of here, there really isn't any other place to stay."

The nobleness of human nature always won; the callers went away quietly, and Betty—in sleep—reassembled her dispersed voice.

Girls on camp shows soon learn that, in addition to possessing the stamina of a commando, it is useful to employ the tact of a diplomat.

After a performance there were always a dozen elegantly eligible young officers eager to date the star. Doris, small, rounded, dimpled but aggressive, would look up, up, up into the bronzed faces and announce fiercely, "You can't take Betty out unless you take me out, too. That's official. I have to keep an eye on Betty; she's always getting herself into predicaments unless I'm there to protect her."

Results were phenomenal. Brass buttons with honorable intentions laughed and took both girls out on the town; wolves silently slunk away.

Surprises on a trip of this kind are always many. A boy from Brooklyn barged up to Betty one day to demand, "Will you autygraph me arm?" Betty obliged, using his pen which was said to contain indelible ink. The task completed, the overjoyed soldier contemplated his arm with solid satisfaction. "I ain't never going to wash it again," he vowed.

Someone was always saying to Betty, "I was in Philadelphia, when you sang there with Lopez. How are things up in the old town now?" Or it was Cleveland, or Memphis, or Denver or Des Moines. Nearly always Betty could tell them something about the town—the name of the hotel at which she had stayed or the name of a restaurant at which some famed pre-war food could be found. It was a connecting link with home for the homesick kid in khaki.

As Betty came off the platform one night, a dark-eyed boy with a shock of curly hair, took her gently in his arms and kissed her in a manner that would have sent the Hays office reeling for a schooner of smelling salts. The entire episode happened so fast that Betty was unable to forestall it in the first place, and the impact was so profound that it took her a few minutes to begin to struggle, in the second. Then, with words massed on her tongue like bees ready to swarm from an outraged hive, all Betty's ire was dispelled when the boy asked pardon. "You're the first girl I've kissed for nearly a year. And I won a bet big enough to take me home on my next furlough, so I can kiss my real girl," he confessed. "Gosh, you're swell."

Not all the experiences on such a trip are joyous. Betty made it a practice to visit the hospital at each camp; a good many entertainers call on the enlisted men, then rush away for lack of time. Betty refused to discriminate in this way: she visited the officers, too.

As she strolled along one corridor, she spied a man in an oxygen tent, so asked to enter. The nurse considered for a moment. "His condition is critical," she admitted. "The doctor doesn't think there is much hope for him. You see, he's lost interest in everything; he makes no effort to get well. He just lies there without even so much as moving his head if he can avoid it."

conundrumming major . . .

That Betty had to see. No one can explain those things—least of all peripatetic, hep cat, jitterbug Betty—but it may be that some instinctive thing made her want to share her own boundless energy with the weak and sick.

She tiptoed in, beaming. "Hi, soldier," she said.

"He's a captain," whispered the nurse.

"They should put rank on pajamas, I guess," grinned Betty, saluting. "Where are you from—just give me a hint and see if I can guess the town."

For a moment his eyes wandered away, lack-lustre and dispassionate. Then two slight wrinkles appeared over one eyebrow. With difficulty he whispered, "A river named after a state flows beside a capital."

WEST LABS., 127 N. Dearborn St., Dept. A-40A, Chicago

Betty's index finger pointed to her forehead; her features writhed as she smeared thought all over her face. The captain's accent was soft, his voice was easily localized. "That, now," said Betty, imitating the accent, "sounds like Austin, Texas!"

The captain's right hand moved out to take Betty's in congratulation. She chattered. She told about making a personal appearance there. She tramped around the room in a perfect lampoon of a cowboy on Saturday night. Softly she sang, "Hand me down my boots and saddles."

The next day, as Betty was leaving the post, she met the nurse who was off-duty. Jubilantly she told Betty that the captain had eaten what was, for him, a terrific breakfast. His entire condition had improved to the point where the doctor was positive the man would live.

murder, she said . . .

On another occasion the blonde blitz almost lost her zoom. She was rocketing through a ward, stopping at every bed to shake hands with the occupant, finding out where the man had lived, then reminiscing about his home town.

She rushed up to this particular boy and thrust out her hand. He shook his head, then—so that she might not think him ungracious—he lifted the cover with his left hand to reveal a bandaged right stump.

Betty swallowed hard. But her expression didn't change. Pity, she knew, would have hurt him more than he could have endured. The casual attitude, the flippant crack was the only possible refuge. "Gosh, looks to me like you had an accident, bub," she said lightly.

The boy relaxed. He grinned, then laughed. "You've got something there, Betty," he agreed. Abruptly he began to ask her questions about Hollywood . . . about make-up—"I'm lucky, see. Some of the guys had bad luck with their faces."

"Me—I was born that way," opined Betty.

After the trip through the hospital there was usually another camp appearance scheduled for Betty. "Murder, He Says"—sung again and again and again. Sun and sand and wind and applauding waves of khaki. Then the little trains again.

At night, Doris and Betty did their laundry. Doris washed every stitch that the two girls had worn that day. The next morning, Betty did the ironing. This division of labor was arranged by Doris because she hates to iron.

The permanent camps were pure, unadulterated heaven to the troupers. There, they were usually guests at the home of the officers. The wives of officers, Betty came to admire and respect.

She said, getting serious in a manner wholly out of character for a slick-chick musical contortionist, "Doris, these women have some meaning in the world. They have found a way of life that comes as close to happiness as a person can get. They follow their men; they have a society all their own. They make every day count, because they don't know how many or how few such days will be. It takes a lot of love to be an Army officer's wife."

And, later on, Doris learned something else about her amazing friend, Hutton. The entertainers were met at the train of a town of some 10,000 population, by the local service club representatives, all civilians for a change. The girls were welcomed as guests in the homes of local people of prominence.

Standing at a second story window one evening, Betty looked over the lawn below to the border of beeches, and beyond their lavish foliage to the placid, established town beyond.

On the sidewalk two children were taking turns riding a tricycle, while a third child was pulling his kid sister in a little red wagon. A pretty woman emerged on the porch when a car drove up and called, "Darling, we're out of bread. Do you mind picking up a loaf at the grocery?"

The masculine voice boomed from the car. "Okay. Say, honey, come along with me for the ride."

"This, brother," said Betty in a small voice, "is happiness. When I think sometimes how darned unhappy I can be; when I think of the struggle I've had, and the struggle I'm going to have to keep right on making, I get very, very tired. I mean I really do. These people have everything. A husband and wife really love each other. The kids grow up in happy homes. Everybody belongs to a woman's club, and the country club. They have solidity and permanence. Happiness, kid!"

his script, his bottle of pop and his buttered matzoth. It was while they were playing the borscht circuit that he acquired his passion for buttered matzoth. Every morning Mom cleans the crumbs out of the bed.

He used to start taking his clothes off at the door and finish up in his room, leaving a trail behind. "Saves bother," he'd explain. "Next morning I can put 'em back on the same way." Since they bought the new house, he hangs things up. First, he's got more clothes—described by Mom as all drapes and droops—and he's reached an age where they mean more to him. Second, when a guy has a couple of nice rooms, like his bedroom and playroom, the least he can do is keep things off the floor.

The playroom, glass-enclosed, is his pride and joy. It's done up in rattan now, but Jack gave him a white polar bear rug for his birthday, and rattan doesn't go with polar bear. So after the war he plans to fix it up with brick glass and blue mirrors and modern stuff—that's his idea of gorgeous. Big, beautiful blue mirrors and brick glass and white fur rugs, zowie! They can always stick the rattan in the backyard. It's okay with Mom. She trusts him that much, to let him do what he wants with his own room.

He hates waking up fast. He wants to float for a while. While floating, he croons his favorite Crosby tunes. Sometimes Mom has to wake him up fast, so she turns the light on or starts talking to him. He hates having the light turned on, he hates being talked to. "I'm asleep," he growls. "Tell me when I wake up."

Still asleep, he shuffles to the piano and plays his two solos—boogie-woogie and classical. The classical's "Clair de Lune," the boogie-woogie's nameless. Still asleep, he dresses and eats—cornflakes every day in the week. Mom eats with him, but there's little conversation. He's still asleep. He trails the body outdoors, gets into the car, and the miracle happens. The minute he hits the car, he's wide awake.

Cars are to Don what babies are to their mothers. On the one hand, they thrill him to the depths. On the other, he can make them sit up and say momma. Give him a car to build or pull apart, and the world is his. The gift of gifts, on his birthday, came from Mom—a Jaguar '38, righthand drive and all. She meant to surprise him, but got so excited herself that she spilled the beans ahead of time. When the car was delivered, Don circled it for a full five minutes. Then he touched a fingertip to it. Then he grabbed Mom and hugged her. "Now I believe it," he said.

He hadn't been driving it more than a month when someone backed into him in a parking lot and dented a fender. He didn't say a word—just drove out, went half a block, turned round and went gunning back.

"Where you going?" asked Gwen.

"Back to fight."

"What's the sense of that? Why didn't you do it right away if you had to?"

"First I thought, what's the use? Now I've got myself steamed up."

When he gets that tight look on his face, you might as well keep quiet. Gwen kept quiet.

The guy was still there. Don jumped out and pointed to his fender. "See that? See that—?"

"Yes," said the guy. "It's awful."

"I'll say it's awful. That's a new car. If my fender's getting dented, I'd like the pleasure of denting it myself."

"I'm terribly sorry," said the guy. "I'll be glad to pay for it."

"Oh," said Don, climbed in and drove off.

"Feeling better?" asked Gwen.

"No. He was so nice I couldn't start a brawl. But I'm still more mad because I couldn't start a brawl."

He hates arguments, but feels the need of a fist fight now and then. Takes it out in boxing at the Y and yearns just once to muss it up in the ring. "Out of town somewhere," he pleads with the powers-that-be. "Under a different name." The idea leaves them cold, so he compensates by going to the matches Friday nights. Gwen doesn't like them, but goes along and hides her face at the worst parts. Don doesn't act excited. All he keeps saying is, "Left jab, left jab, left jab."

But then he's just naturally deadpan. He can slay the rest of the crowd without moving a muscle. Like when he imitates an Englishman. Or the time they happened to see a smash-up, and everybody got out and started arguing which car hit which. "Let's draw matzoth," said Don, "and decide." Came the audience response. "Yeah," he agreed, "that was pretty funny. Somebody else should've said it so I could've laughed."

He wants his women to look nice. "If you're coming to the studio," he tells Mom, "wear something young. That hat yesterday looked like you're somebody's gramma."

"I am."

"And what's the idea, did you run out of lip rouge?"

"Oh, get along with you, son. That won't help the wrinkles."

"What wrinkles?" he asks.

"Bless you," she answers.

The dress he likes Gwen best in is the one she wore on their first date—yellow crepe with pleats all round. The suit she likes him best in is a brown-and-white stripe. He used it in "The Third Glory," his coming picture. There's a scene where he was supposed to catch and tear it in an electric fan. He kept saying "no."

"But why, Don? The studio'll make it good."

"It's not that. Only—well, this is my girl's favorite suit, and I won't tear it. Not for anything."

He's generally late for dates. With the program lined up for him by Universal, he's got so many darn things to do that when he gets home, he's torn two ways. Wants to hurry so he'll be on time, and doesn't want to hurry so he can relax.

Anyway, you can't dress in a hurry. He found a hair on his chin a few months ago and shaved it off. Now he's got enough hairs so he has to shave every day—he thinks. Also he's fussy about the hair on his head—and about his teeth, which he brushes 99 times a day. And he's got to get all the drapes and droops right.

When he finally presents himself at Gwen's door, there's likely to be a box under his arm. Not flowers. Some fuzzy animal. They both love fuzzy animals. Gwen's bed is piled high with specimens brought by Don. You can't be too sore at a boy who brings you an animal.

BIG BOY

face. "Sonny Tufts," he said before he could catch himself and blushed purple. Made a quick recovery, though. Hanging on to the diploma as though loath to hand it over, he eyed the young giant sardonically. "I'd never have believed it," quoth President Seymour.

It took a good five minutes for the howls to die down, and no one howled any louder than Bowen Charleton III. Except for anthropology, his major, he'd gone clipping through college at a fast 61. Too busy rowing, playing football and organizing bands.

Among his curiosities, he preserves the letter his mother wrote him when he announced that he was going to Yale. The first Tufts settled in Winchester 300 years ago, and the family hasn't moved three square miles since. So Harvard's been a tradition with them. Sonny plumped for Yale, because that's where his crowd at Exeter was going. "Yale," wrote his mother in stately measures, "may be for some people. Not for us."

Mother's a Beacon Street stalwart, and Sonny gets a bang out of her ways—especially since he broke loose at the age of 14. (They amused him less when he wanted to play football Saturday afternoons and had to go riding instead, because nice boys went riding.) A year ago he was doing night-club work. When people inquired, Mother'd go vague on them. "Oh, we don't know exactly where Sonny is just now—down in New York somewhere, doing something or other—. Tell me, how was the season at Newport last summer?"

"So Proudly We Hail" brought her 'round. The home town turned out in style for the local boy. Sirens and police escorts. Cameras and reporters and yelling crowds. Two lines of ushers to get Kansas out of the theater in one piece. Mother was impressed. The cameramen wanted pictures of her meeting with Sonny, and she played up like one to the business born.

Dad was a different proposition. All that mattered to Dad was guts. A banker himself, he did tentatively suggest that his elder son might like to follow in his footsteps. When Sonny pointed out that he couldn't even keep his checkbook straight so how could he be a banker, Dad conceded the point.

Music was Sonny's line. He got a mandolin the Christmas he was eight, and his uncle taught him to play "Down by the Stream where I First Met Rebecca." From there he was off. Banjo, sax, guitar, piano and on up to string instruments. When he started organizing bands, he settled for the drums, which were easiest and made the most noise. His first singing models were Eddie Cantor, Bea Lillie and the Duncan Sisters.

He sang with the Trinity choir. Mother thought that was lovely. She thought it revolting when he learned all the songs from "Topsy and Eva." Dad roared, got him to the piano when people were at the house. The showdown came the summer he was 14.

Tito Bruin was a Harvard boy who liked Sonny's work on the drums. He had a band set for a Mediterranean cruise. "How'd you like to make the trip with us, kid?" Sonny would have made a trip to the moon with big Irish Tito—a swell pianist, a guy who said phooey! to society stuff. Besides, he was flattered.

tramp in white linen . . .

That started the pattern, which continued through Exeter and Yale. At college he organized his own band for the cruises. Winters they'd play at girls' schools, at proms and house parties. Summers they'd sail the southern seas, get off at Naples, play Rome, Florence, Venice and catch the boat back at Trieste. Once he missed the boat and shrank from wiring home for money. Money meant nothing to Dad, but initiative meant a lot.

In one white suit he took himself to Barcelona and hired out as stoker on a tramp. Only thing—he forgot to ask where the boat went from there. It went around Spain, by river to Seville, down to Casablanca and the Gold Coast. He likes to remember that he hit Casablanca before FDR or Humphrey Bogart.

The next turn came because Tito Schipa was on board the summer of his junior year and because Sonny got a little high one night. If he hadn't been high, he wouldn't have found the nerve to approach Señor Schipa after the ship's concert. "I'd like to do opera," he said.

"There's just one way to do it. Study."

So when they landed, Sonny checked his drums in and, as they were crossing the bridge, dropped the check into the water. There's nothing like recognizing your own weaknesses. He knew he'd never have the heart to sell the drums.

No drums, no band. He studied opera instead through his senior year. Then to Paris for more study. Then to New York, where his ambitions got a sudden shot in the arm.

A friend of his knew Earl Lewis, assistant director at the Met. Lewis happened to let fall a testy remark. "Where are all these American tenors you hear about?"

"I know one," said the friend promptly.

"Tell him to come down."

In a blue funk, the operatic aspirant tried to wiggle out of it. His sponsor led him by the hand to the stage of the Metropolitan. In the glare of a spotlight, with terror beating his brains out, he sang. Apparently his voice was unaffected. They said it was fine. They told him to come back after he'd studied some French and Italian roles. Mother was elated. She phoned every week to find out why he wasn't at the Met yet. This time it was Dad who seemed a little leery.

Dad would have enjoyed the outcome of the story, but he didn't live to see it. He died while Sonny was still doing this opera stuff and left a trust fund which made possible further lessons at 15 bucks a throw. Meantime Sonny had practically immured himself behind a brownstone front, where he pecked out scores with one finger.

In the midst of all this, Leonard Sillman offered him a spot in "Who's Who." If the truth must be told, Sonny was growing weary of the Spartan life. Its rigidity cramped his natural spirits. To make the Met, he'd have to go on studying for another two years.

He did all right in musicals. He did all right at night clubs. But not till he took Dad's advice, did he go over big. "There are one million voices in these United States," said Tufts to Tufts. "Get yourself something special." So, tongue in cheek, he sat down and wrote a little fantasy about a cowboy who first got tangled up, then fed up with a society dame. He wove it through a medley of cowboy songs, presented the number in his big bashful way and plunk! he was a headliner, pulling down three times as much as any but the top singers at the Met. Which failed to console Mother.

Meantime he'd married. There was this girl in "Who's Who" he'd been traveling around with. She ups and introduces him to Barbara Dare, her best friend. One look at the tall, soft-eyed brunette, and brother, that was all! Four months later they hustled over to New Jersey and got married. Officially, Sonny was still studying for the opera, so they thought they might as well keep it to themselves for a while.

They came out to California with an angel and a hotel manager. Alexis Thompson was the angel. He'd been a year behind Sonny at Yale and thought his friend ought to be in pictures. Not only thought it, but did something about it. "I'm going out to California on my last fling before I join the Army. I'll take you and Barbara along. I'll get someone to act as your nursemaid, front for you at the studio—Jack Donnelly, say. I'll sign a contract with you and pay you a salary. That way, you don't have to let them push you around. Just sit till they offer you something good."

Jack Donnelly's a little red-faced Irishman. Having spent his life in hotel business, he's innocent of the subtleties of the movie game. So he pushed right into Joe Egli's office at Para., Sonny trailing right behind.

"This is my friend, Sonny Tufts. He'd like to be in movies."

"Would he now," said Joe.

Sonny blushed and headed for the door, where Egli nailed him with an appraising sweep from head to toes. "No harm in giving your friend a test," he observed.

For his singing test Sonny did the cowbody medley. For a dramatic test, they gave him something vaguely familiar and stood his hair on end—"we have only ten days—let's make them bubble like vintage champagne—"

"I'm strictly a lunk," he groaned, "—a cigarette-in-the-side-of-the-mouth-guy. I can't talk like that—"

"Talk," they said.

So he gagged it.

mock romeo . . .

Two executives watched the test run off. One scratched his ear. "Either the guy's sensational or he stinks. I can't figure which."

"Let's figure why they gave him Charles Boyer dialogue from 'Love Affair,' and we may get the answer."

The answer came out right. They signed him. Mark Sandrich gave him the star-building part of Kansas in "So Proudly We Hail." At the preview, his first appearance was greeted by silence. When he lumbered on for the second time, they took the roof off—RKO snatched him for "Government Girl." Sandrich grabbed him back to play opposite Goddard in "When I Come Back." He and Barbara are in San Francisco now, where most of the picture's being shot.

You wouldn't think it to look at her, but Barbara's domestic. With her height, her dark beauty, her smooth Spanish hair-do, she suggests the exotic. Instead, she's incurably sweet and feminine—the Melanie type, her husband calls her. He has yet to meet the person she dislikes or criticizes.

Only one thing bothers Sonny. Movie stars are supposed to be immaculate. He thinks that's a pain in the neck. He'd sooner have a tooth or his appendix out, than his nails manicured. He went through "Government Girl" in one pair of shoes and never had 'em shined. His hands are always grubby, his hair's always mussed. When it gets too bad, Barbara takes a comb to it.

In New York he blew his topper and invested in a fancy suit of pajamas. They lie unmolested in his drawer, while he goes to bed in a broken-down T-shirt.

"Fine thing," says his wife. "What did you buy them for?"

"To wear when I play my next Boyer part," grins Kansas.

The greatest star of the screen!

We're talking about "Madame Curie", one of the finer efforts in the annals of motion picture progress.

★ ★ ★ ★

This adventurous romance of the woman whose love and devotion endowed us with the magic of radium is in for a run at the famed Radio City Music Hall.

★ ★ ★ ★

Our office wag wishes to edit this copy to read "Radium" City Music Hall.

★ ★ ★ ★

As a matter of fact Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer—your favorite film company we take it—has a few pictures in the bag which are really going to cause ohs and ahs, pull in the awards, and all that sort of thing.

★ ★ ★ ★

"A Guy Named Joe", "The White Cliffs", "Madame Curie". Three worthy successors to "Mrs. Miniver" and "Random Harvest".

★ ★ ★ ★

As a matter of course, Greer Garson is "Madame Curie". Greer and Walter Pidgeon are the stars.

★ ★ ★ ★

Directed by Mervyn LeRoy and produced by Sidney Franklin, the "Random Harvest" duo, "Madame Curie" can be described in a word of one syllable—great.

★ ★ ★ ★

Its cast, typical of M-G-M, includes ten names additional to Greer Garson and Walter Pidgeon—names that could grace any theatre marquee and mean something.

★ ★ ★ ★

They are Henry Travers, Albert Basserman, Robert Walker, C. Aubrey Smith, Dame May Whitty, Victor Francen, Elsa Basserman, Reginald Owen, Van Johnson and Margaret O'Brien.

★ ★ ★ ★

Incidentally the mention of Margaret O'Brien makes us think of another fine M-G-M film "The Lost Angel" which you must not miss.

★ ★ ★ ★

But first comes "Madame Curie" with our favorite screen couple in a screen play by Paul Osborn and Paul H. Rameau based on the book by Eve Curie.

★ ★ ★ ★

Produced with love and attention to detail, with settings that are superbly artistic, a camera that understands, and a story that will keep you enthralled, "Madame Curie" is a real event in the theatre.

By Virginia Wilson

One day while gathering wood outside their French village with her sister, Bernadette (Jennifer Jones) sees a vision of a beautiful lady in white at mouth of a cave.

THE SONG OF BERNADETTE

Here is the story of a miracle. It is a story so tender, so moving and so real that you will believe in that miracle without another thought. Faith is the strongest single force in the world, and we need lots of it today. "The Song of Bernadette" will help give it to us.

The miracle occurs in the little town of Lourdes, in the French Pyrenees. It happens not to a rich or powerful or even intellectual member of the community, but to a simple little peasant girl named Bernadette Soubirous. Bernadette's family is incredibly poor. She herself is not bright in school, and her first 14 years have passed without anything to mark her as different from the other girls she knows.

This particular day seems to her like any other. She is scolded by her teacher, Sister Vauzous (Gladys Cooper), for not knowing

Lady is visible only to her, and townspeople believe her to be lying or insane. When questioned by authorities (Alan Napier Chas. Bickford, Vincent Price), she sticks to her story.

As a final test, they ask her to have Lady perform a miracle. A rivulet of healing water springs out of the ground. Because she was chosen by Heaven to see Vision, Church says it's her duty to take veil.

Years later Bernadette develops a tumor and dies, blessed by one last Vision of The Beautiful Lady. Great tribute is paid her in the church built around the cave, which has become a shrine for healing.

the answer to a question about the Holy Trinity. But Bernadette often doesn't know the answers. After school in the afternoon she and her sister, Marie (Ermadean Walters), and a friend, Jeanne (Mary Anderson), go off together to gather firewood. Jeanne and Marie cross a little brook near the village dump, leaving Bernadette behind. And there, in that amazingly humble setting, the girl sees a vision. A lady appears, standing in a little grotto on the hillside. She is a beautiful lady, bathed in golden radiance, with roses at her bare feet. She speaks to Bernadette graciously, but when the other girls return, she disappears.

You can imagine what would happen if you told your friends and family a story like that. It happens to Bernadette. Her schoolmates laugh at her, and her father reprimands her crossly for making up fairy tales. But next day Bernadette goes back to the grotto and sees the Lady again. This time the mystical radiance is so strong that the girl faints, but not before she has promised the Lady that she will come to the grotto every day.

Rumors spread fast in a small town. Soon everyone knows that the little Soubirous girl is seeing visions. They accept Bernadette as a child of Heaven or dismiss her as an accomplished liar, according to their temperaments. But enough of them believe her so that the thing becomes a sensation, and the story reaches the newspapers. Bernadette becomes the object of a searching, cruel investigation. Every possible attempt is made to get her to confess the whole affair is a fabrication. One of her most bitter inquisitors is Dutour (Vincent Price), the cynical Imperial Prosecutor. Another is Peyramale (Charles Bickford) who represents the local church and fears that Bernadette's story will cast doubt on her whole religion. It is, curiously enough, a man of science who believes her wholeheartedly. Dr. Dozous (Lee Cobb) is convinced that Bernadette is too simple and naive a child to make up such a story, and he knows that her faints are physically genuine.

The girl's honest, straightforward answers to the investigators' questions baffle every attempt to discredit her. And now Peyramale is won over by a miracle which the Lady performs at Bernadette's request. From the barren ground a spring of healing water suddenly begins to flow. It brings sight to old Bouriette's blind eye. It brings life back to the dying baby of Croisine Bouhouhorts. Faith and healing go always hand in hand, and miracles are the result.

The authorities, completely dismayed and bewildered by these events, order the grotto boarded up. Bernadette says a sad farewell to her Lady, who promises her happiness in the next world but not in this.

And, truly, Bernadette finds little happiness here on earth. Those who are touched by Heaven may not live as the rest of us do, and at last Bernadette realizes that only as a nun will she find peace.

This is an extraordinary picture. Not only for its theme, but in the delicacy and artistry with which it has been handled. Jennifer Jones is Bernadette, and the rest of the cast is equally effective. "The Song of Bernadette" is, in all probability, the picture of the year.—20th-Fox.

P. S.

"The Song of Bernadette" was in preparation eleven months, in actual work before the cameras three months . . . Famed Czech novelist Franz Werfel hid for small town of Lourdes. Vowed if he ever reached America safely, he wouldn't do another thing until he wrote the story of Bernadette which he had come to know from reading two tiny pamphlets discovered in his hide-out . . . A New York literary agent sent galley proofs of the book Werfel finally wrote to Producer William Perlberg, who was skeptical at first, but felt convinced it would make one of the most inspiring pictures in the history of the industry by the time he got to the last page . . . Every big-name writer in town wanted a chance to script the film, but Perlberg turned the story over to George Seaton, who heretofore had written only comedies. To those who criticized, Perlberg said, "I have faith in him. I know he can do a fine, craftsmanlike job. He isn't an egotist, won't try to alter the story" . . . Seaton went to the desert for eight weeks, came back with a wonderful script. Director Henry King filmed it as is . . . Director King was on duty with the Civilian Air Patrol when the script was sent to him. He had to read it piecemeal between flights and accepted the assignment because he thinks the film will be the high spot of his career . . . Seven girls were tested for the role of "Bernadette" using the Vision scene. King stood behind the camera, waved a long stick and asked the girls to imagine they were seeing the Vision. All of them did very well, but "only Jennifer actually saw a Vision" . . . She had never worked in pictures before, but the studio cured her camera fright by having her work with every

Are You in the Know?

Are these Lindy Hoppers doing—

☐ A Boogie
☐ A Shorty George
☐ A Tip

"Know how" is what makes the difference between a smooth rug-cutter and a dud! So lady, be hep to this "shine" step. It's a Tip—and here's another: Know how to stay in the fun regardless of what time of the month it is! It's simple, for Kotex sanitary napkins are more comfortable—and that special safety center keeps you protected—poise-perfect. So save your "jitters" for a jive session.

This Hair-do's for you—if ☐ Your face is long ☐ Heart-shaped

☐ Round

Down with pompadours—up with sweeping manes! Newest locks have a flat-topped look. They're shorter, sleek, often center-parted. Vary this hair style to suit your face-type, but if your face is long, take the short hair-do shown here—flat crowned, and fluffed a bit at the sides. The "flat" look is a grooming commandment when "certain" outlines threaten a sleek costume. That's when you thank Kotex for those flat pressed ends. Because they're not stubby, no one will guess your secret.

How would you introduce them?

☐ "Capt. Smith, this is Lieut. Brown"
☐ "Miss Brown, may I present Capt. Smith"
☐ "Lieut. Brown, Capt. Smith"

Learn your military P's and Q's! When introducing army officers, mention the one with higher rank first—even if the other is a woman. "Captain Smith, this is Lieutenant Brown" is correct (and don't address the Wac as "Miss"!). Knowing your army etiquette is a social must, these wartime days. On difficult days, too, you can preserve your "social security." Just depend on the comfort Kotex gives, for Kotex stays soft while wearing. You'll learn—comfort, confidence and Kotex go together!

*T. M. Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

Girls in the know choose KOTEX*

Yes, more girls choose KOTEX than all other brands of pads put together.

For Trying Days, try KURB tablets...if you suffer from cramps. It's a Kotex product, expressly compounded for relief of periodic discomfort. Take only as directed on the package and see how KURBS can help you!

☐ Check here if you're teen age and want free the newly-edited booklet "As One Girl To Another." You'll learn do's and don'ts for difficult days . . . the lowdown on grooming, sports, social contacts.

☐ Check here if you're a war worker and want free the new booklet "That Day Is Here Again." Full of facts on diet, cramps, exercise, lifting. It tells how to stay on the job, even on "problem" days.

supporting player in their tests three months before production began.

WHAT A WOMAN!

Rosalind Russell specializes in playing career women. The smooth, feminine kind who make a million with one hand while they're breaking hearts with the other. In "What A Woman!" Rosalind is an agent, or, as Hollywood says, a "flesh-peddler." An agent, according to a line in the picture, is someone who takes a short cut to fame by developing other people's talents instead of his own, and collecting ten per cent. In the case of this particular agent, the ten per cents have mounted up till "Carol Ainsley, Inc." is a fantastic business.

None of which impresses Henry Pepper (Brian Aherne), a magazine writer who has been assigned to do a profile on Miss Ainsley. "Women," according to Henry, "are for after office hours." He experiences a slight change of heart when he gets a birds' eye view of Carol, and settles down happily to getting material for a nice long profile.

Carol is too involved in business worries to pay much attention to Henry at first. She has just sold the best seller "Whirlwind" to the movies for a fabulous sum, and is now engaged in a search for a man to play the hero. He must be an unknown, and he must be a guy who will stop the women dead in their tracks.

She finally discovers him in the person of Michael Cobb (Willard Parker) who wrote "The Whirlwind," under the pen name of Anthony Street. He is, unbelievably, a college professor, and is ashamed of having written a popular novel, so he has kept his identity secret. Carol takes one look at him and says, "This is it!" But her interest is entirely professional. Michael says, "This is it!" too, but his intentions are strictly romantic.

Henry sticks around, egging them both on and having fun in his own quiet way. Then all of a sudden he discovers he's in love with Carol himself, and the situation ceases to seem so funny. From there on, there's hell to pay.

Rosalind turns in a breezy portrayal of the agent, and Brian is his usual suave self. Willard Parker is as gorgeous a hunk of man as you've laid eyes on since Mature deserted Hollywood.—Col.

P. S.

Director Irving Cummings calls his actors and actresses to work in love scenes with, "Man your battle stations, kids!" . . . Roz Russell, besides her picture career, does a full time job of charity work, war entertainment and motion picture industry problem solving. Is chairman of a special sub-committee for Information for the Victory Committee, Vice-President of the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences, director of the Hollywood Guild (which cares for needy families), hostess and a sponsor at the Masquer's Club's parties for servicemen, a director of the newly opened Sister Kenny Institute in Minneapolis . . . Willard Parker's real name is Worster Van Eps, took his professional name from his godfather, the noted Dr. Willard Parker . . . Brian Aherne inaugurated the policy of giving autographs only to those who will purchase a ten-cent war stamp. Is now trying to get the Screen Actors Guild to ask all players to adopt the practice.

CRY HAVOC

The story of nurses at Bataan has been told before. It will, in all probability, be told again—and again. Heroism is a tale that always bears repeating, and there is

This group of girls, unlike those in "So Proudly We Hail," are not regular nurses. They are just volunteers who have had no real experience, except a first aid class or two. They are pressed into service by the two nurses in charge—Captain Marsh (Fay Bainter) and Lieutenant Smith (Margaret Sullavan)—because there is literally no one else available.

The girls come from varied backgrounds—everything from Philadelphia Main Line society to Brooklyn burlesque. Their reactions to dirt, hunger and death are just as varied. Smitty, looking them over on their arrival, is in despair. What good will they be? A bunch of kids in pretty clothes, with no more idea than a fly of what a bomb can do to a human being. But the girls learn fast under fire—learn that caring for wounded soldiers is so vital a job that nothing else matters. Not bombs, nor disease nor anything.

Smitty, who is secretly facing death from malignant malaria, is not an easy person to work for. She has a particular feud with Pat (Ann Sothern), whom she considers impertinent and a bad influence. Pat, on the other hand, is sure that Smitty dislikes her because she gets some attention from Lieutenant Holt. Holt is the hero of the picture, but he never appears on the screen except in one "long shot." His presence, however, provides much of the action.

The bombing scenes are effective, but reminiscent of "So Proudly We Hail." It is the emotional scenes in the women's shelter which provide the raison d'etre for "Cry Havoc," and they are perhaps a little on the talkative side. More action would have lent an effective contrast. But this is still a moving, sympathetic story of a group of brave girls.

There may be a wonderfully dramatic story in that packet of bonds lying in your dresser drawer. A story of small sacrifices and big ones. We want you to tell us about it. We want to know just how you're managing to scrape together over 10% of your weekly salary or income for War Stamps and Bonds. And why? What, specifically, keeps nudging you on? Tell us, and if your letter is selected as the prize-winning one of the month, we'll send you $10 in war stamps. Address your letters to MODERN SCREEN, 149 Madison Ave., New York 16, N. Y.

This month's prize-winning letter:

For 14 months I traveled with my husband and lived in the town nearest his camp. Three months ago, we decided it was unwise and expensive, especially on a sergeant's salary. We agreed that I should go home and live with my family. Since then I've been buying a bond a month. Before, I was lucky if I could manage a 25c stamp. Since my husband now lives in the barracks, our expenses are reduced still further, and I hardly feel the pinch of the $17.50 each month from my husband's $106 pay. By February, our heir apparent, who's due then, will have at least six to eight bonds to his credit.

All 13 gals went without makeup, gritted their teeth and smiled when their sister actresses insisted on coming calling on their set dressed in cool sheer prints, and newly Max Factor-ed . . . Over-size, dirty dungarees were the only "costumes" issued for the film . . . Maggie Sullavan brought her two daughters, Brooke and Bridget, to watch her work in some of the less tense scenes . . . On the set, a messenger brought Ann Sothern a new copy of Charley Grapewin's novel, "Meg Randall," and her pals discovered the girl on the book jacket cover looked just like Annie! Ann checked with Charley and discovered it was just coincidence. Said Mr. G., "Lots of folks have asked me if that's you. As far as I know, she isn't. The only explanation I can make is that the illustrator is a Sothern fan." Ann's best day was the one she got off, to marry Lt. Robert Sterling of the AAF.

BRIDGE OF SAN LUIS REY

Why do people die? Oh, of course everyone dies sometime, but why do some die suddenly, violently, by accident? That's what a young priest, Brother Juniper (Donald Woods), tries to find out in "The Bridge of San Luis Rey." He has just seen five people flung to death from a broken bridge high in the Peruvian Pyrenees. Why were those five people fated to die this way? What was there in their lives to create this destiny?

Brother Juniper goes to a neighboring Abbess (Blanche Yurka) in his search for information. She tells him of the twin brothers, Manuel and Esteban. (Francis Lederer plays both). Orphans, they were each given the same education, but Manuel, a dashing devil-may-care lad, ran off to sea. Esteban, who was a more studious type, became a public letter writer for the people of Lima. The brothers were devoted to each other, but they were soon separated by more than Manuel's love of the sea. A girl is involved—a gay, beautiful singer named Micaela (Lynn Bari). Manuel falls madly in love with her. Micaela has started her career by singing in the streets of Lima, but with the help of Uncle Pio (Akim Tamiroff), a wily, cynical old peasant, she is launched in a theatrical presentation of considerable magnificence.

In the course of her career she meets the Viceroy (Louis Calhern), who is entranced with her immediately. He decides to move her right over to the palace. This displeases the powerful Marquessa (Nazimova) who has hitherto exerted her influence over him. She begins to plot against him, and the Marquessa is a very expert plotter indeed. But she is also a lonely woman who has recently adopted a young girl from a convent, as a companion. The girl, Pepita (June Lorring) disconcerts the worldly Marquessa with her utter goodness and innocence. She even makes the Marquessa wonder, eventually, if intrigue is worth while. In the meantime Manuel returns from the sea, and Micaela must choose between him and the Viceroy.

These people, their lives and the eventual tragic death of five of them are woven into an engrossing tapestry of fate. Akim Tamiroff is particularly triumphant in his role of Uncle Pio. "The Bridge of San Luis Rey" is as fascinating a puzzle of destiny now as when it won the Pulitzer Prize years ago.—U. A.

P. S.

This is the first picture Mr. Benedict Bogeaus has ever produced. He chose "San Luis Rey" for his first story at the suggestion of friend Arthur Landau, veteran Hollywood story agent, who in turn chose it because it's one of the most popular books in the public library, year in and year out; and because it had fine production possibilities with opportunities for good actors to do some really important emoting . . . Lynn Bari was borrowed from 20th Century-Fox for the role of La Perrichole, gets to wear a silver lamé gown with a net of silver sequins weighing as much as she does—110 pounds . . . Nazimova, at 64, has twice as much energy as women half her age. Says she hasn't any recipe for youth, really, but "so many women let themselves get old by sitting down and looking at their middles. I never do that. It gives you a double chin. I always look up!" She suffers from a fear of heights, yet refused to have a double for the bridge-crashing scenes.

KNICKERBOCKER HOLIDAY

Ordinarily you could put the entire plot of a movie "musical" into your right eye with no appreciable discomfort therefrom. But "Knickerbocker Holiday" has a story which provides plenty of interest, as well as giving Nelson Eddy his best acting opportunity in years. Whether he takes advantage of that opportunity is something else again. If you're an Eddy fan, you'll probably think he does.

Charles Coburn also has a nice fat part and makes the most of it. The setting is the town of New Amsterdam (New York to you!) around 1650, shortly after Manhattan was purchased from the Indians for exactly $23 and a string of beads. (Chorus—give it back!) The new governor, Peter Stuyvesant (Charles Coburn) is to arrive any minute, and the town is agog. Particularly the graft-stuffed town council, which has been getting way with murder.

One man, Brom Broeck (Nelson Eddy), is hoping the governor will institute some much needed reforms. Brom has been writing editorials for the local newspaper on that subject for a long time, but who reads editorials? Apparently the Town Council does, because a couple of girls run in this morning to tell Brom he's about to be arrested for sedition. One of the girls is Tina (Constance Dowling), daughter of the chief councilman and a very pretty dish indeed. Brom is in love with her, but he hasn't gotten any farther with that than with his campaign for reform. He stops now to kiss her, and the gendarmes arrive before he's through and cart him off to jail.

Governor Stuyvesant's boat docks, and the governor lands, complete with a startling, silver-studded wooden leg. He promptly complicates matters by falling in love with Tina. At his age, too! Love and reform both take quite a kicking around before everything straightens out to form a Knickerbocker Holiday!

Nelson Eddy has some particularly charming songs to sing, and Charles Coburn is, as usual, a gruff old gentleman with a heart of gold. Constance Dowling wears ten petticoats and manages to look seductive in spite of them.—U. A.

Nelson Eddy, star, rates another credit as composer in this one. Wrote "Oh Woe" and "Holiday." Most of the original music written by Kurt Weill for the Maxwell Anderson stage play has been retained, and Charles Coburn gets to sing the haunting "September Song" . . . Constance Dowling will be a new face to movie fans. Half Russian, half Irish, she's a volatile bundle of beauty with a natural flair for things dramatic. Came to Hollywood via stage work in New York . . . Charles Coburn could work only ten minutes at a time with his leg bent double. 39 fittings were necessary to set the peg leg he wears in the film . . . The photographers had a tough time figuring out a way to keep their cameras from shaking during Carmen Amaya's dance numbers. The heel-pounding typical of her Flamenco style of terpsichore caused vibrations. They finally whipped up a crane-like contraption, rigged so the part farthest from the camera would absorb all the noise bounce.

LOST ANGEL

I'll bet this picture will surprise you. It's what they refer to in racing circles as a "sleeper." The story of an infant prodigy brought up by college professors till the age of six doesn't sound like anything to cause dancing in the streets, does it? But when you put little Margaret O'Brien in the role of the prodigy, and team her up with a tough newspaperman played by James Craig, you've got something. Marsha Hunt, Philip Merivale, Donald Meek and Keenan Wynn lend additional gusto to the proceedings.

A group of scientists adopt a baby girl as an experiment. For the first six years of her life they teach her all the things that will develop her brain and body to the utmost. She studies Chinese poetry instead of reading Mother Goose, does Yogi exercises instead of skipping rope. They've even named her Alpha after the first letter of the Greek alphabet. On her sixth birthday some visiting professors from Harvard arrive to test her I. Q. The scientific world awaits the result with bated breath.

But about that time a newspaperman named Mike (James Craig) also arrives. Not from choice—he'd rather be investigating the case of a gangster named Packy (Keenan Wynn) who, Mike thinks, has been framed on a murder rap. Or else he'd like to be out with his charming girl friend, Katie (Marsha Hunt), a night club singer. But his editor has sent him to interview Alpha, and his not to reason why. Something about the kid's grave loneliness bothers Mike. It isn't right to bring her up like that, not having any fun or believing in fairies or Santa Claus or anything. So Mike sets out to remedy the situation. What he doesn't expect is that Alpha will fall so hard for his talk about magic and leprechauns that she'll run away from the Institute and come looking for him. But she does—and at the same time Packy breaks jail and shows up at Mike's apartment. It's a laughter packed situation, and the scene of Alpha teaching the gangster Yogi will enchant you completely.

This is a long shot that came home a winner.—M-G-M.

Margaret O'Brien didn't know what she was saying when she solemnly rattled off "Sine me gracias agere propter gratulationes vestras." The Latin acceptance given a copy of "An Introduction to Philosophy." She learned it from hearing her mother read it to her, then did the whole speech perfectly the first take—even though a baby tooth fell out and had to be replaced before the scene could be shot again . . . Jimmy Craig has 2500 Cornish Cross chickens on his ranch in the San Fernando Valley. His big problem used to be market day, when he and his hired man had to rush around choosing and catching the unlucky ones. Finally Jimmy built a flat section of chicken house wall of lath and wire netting. It slides the length of each chicken run on two taut wires. As it moves along, it heads all the feathered fellows to one end of the run—and the wire pens them in. Jim can then pick out the selected stock and crate them with little or no effort!

TENDER COMRADE

Suppose you were one of the kids who got married back in 1939. The war seemed awfully far away then. Oh, sure, there were people who said we'd get into it eventually. But you figured there were always a few sourpusses like that around. So—you got married, and the honeymoon was sheer heaven, and you started keeping house. Maybe you had a few arguments with your husband about your wanting to take a job and his thinking woman's place is in the home. Or about whether it was a good idea to have children now or wait till later when you had more money in the bank. But the arguments were made up with kisses, and life was almost too wonderful to bear.

That's the way it was with "Jo" Jones (Ginger Rogers) and her husband, Chris (Robert Ryan). That's the way they got married, and those are the things they argued about. And then came Pearl Harbor . . .

So now Chris is Sergeant Jones of the U. S. Army, saying a last farewell to Jo before he goes overseas. And Jo kisses him good-by and goes back to her job on the assembly line of the war plant. Three other women work alongside Jo. They are Helen (Patricia Collinge), who is older than the others and has a son as well as a husband overseas; Barbara (Ruth Hussey), whose husband is a sailor with a girl in every port; and Doris (Kim Hunter), who seems like such a child that the rest can't believe it when she announces that she has just married a soldier named Tony.

The four war wives rent a house and even have the super good fortune to acquire a housekeeper named Manya (Mady Christians). But life for a group of women together is apt to be complicated when they are as different as these four. Especially since Jo finds she's going to have a baby.

The way they work out their problems will make you weep as well as laugh. It will bring the war as close to you as next door. Watch especially for little Kim Hunter, as Dora—she has quite a future. But it's Jo's picture, and you'll find yourself arguing and kissing and praying right along with Jo Jones. Because that's the way Ginger Rogers acts. Ginger's a war wife herself—she knows—RKO.

P. S.

"Tender Comrade" was so true to life for many of the cast, the film is bound to have a special warmth about it . . . Three days after the picture finished, Bob Ryan reported for induction in the Army. Says he told his wife the very same things he had to say in the script to Ginger Rogers . . . Ginger's husband, Marine John Calvin Briggs, left for an unknown overseas destination the week

BUT I CAN SUPPORT OUR FAMILY!

1. ANSWER: It isn't a question of pride! Millions more women must take jobs or our war effort will bog down! It means winning the war—saving lives of our boys! It's up to each husband to help his wife get a job.

BUT HOW DOES A CIVILIAN JOB HELP?

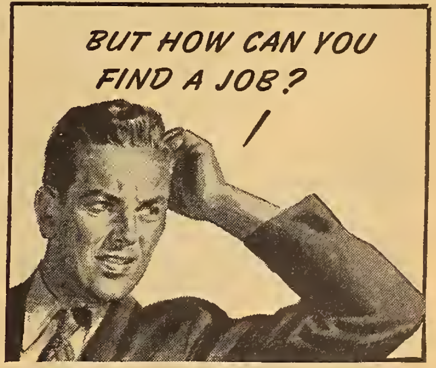
2. ANSWER: Just as fighters need weapons, so civilians need restaurants, stores, buses, laundries, etc., to keep going. That's why housewives, with vital civilian jobs, speed victory as much as girls in war plants!

BUT I MIGHT GET DRAFTED SOONER!

3. ANSWER: A wife's job does not, in itself, affect her husband's draft status in any way. And isn't it better for you to get a job now—if he's called anyway—and have a plan to support yourself and family?

WE'LL TALK ABOUT IT SOME OTHER TIME!

4. ANSWER: Right now is the time to discuss it! Because your country needs women at once! Millions of them! With or without experience! Full or part time! In war plants and in civilian jobs.



BUT HOW CAN YOU FIND A JOB?

5. ANSWER: Easy! Your newspaper want ads show the kind of jobs in your town. And you can get free advice at your local U. S. Employment Service Office. "The More Women at Work—The Sooner We'll Win!"

Originally the part was assigned to Katina Paxinou, but when Madame Paxinou's illness took a turn for the worse, presaging a long recovery, RKO was forced to substitute Miss Christians . . . Ginger and Bob have more love scenes in this film than she's had with any of her leading men since "Kitty Foyle." The writer is the same man who adapted "Foyle," incidentally—Dalton Trumbo, an A No. 1 movie scripter who turns in his work in actual shooting-script form with camera directions, notes to the actors, etc., already incorporated. Works at home, because he thinks most studio writers' offices are "like rabbit hutches, with the wind blowing in under the door."

THIS IS THE LIFE

If I had to hitch my wagon to a particular star these days, I'd pick young Donald O'Connor. The lad is going places fast. In this latest picture he has toned down a bit, and some of the rough edges have been smoothed, with pleasing results. He still has that natural charm that makes friends with you right away.

Susanna Foster plays the object of his affections. She has a beautiful voice and she's an attractive girl, but somebody ought to tell her not to wear her hair up. It looks awful! As Angela, she plays an 18-year-old, in love in a moon-struck fashion with a man twice her age. The man is Hilary Jarrett (Patric Knowles), a surgeon and a major in the United States Army. He is convalescing from tropical fever at the little country hotel run by Angela's Aunt Betsy (Dorothy Peterson). When Hilary sees that Angela is talking herself into thinking she's in love with him, he leaves for his home in New York. Before he goes, he confides in her worried boy friend, Jimmy (Donald O'Connor), that he's interested in her only as a friend—particularly in her vocal career.

However, Angela follows him to New York, gets him in a weak moment and wangles an engagement ring out of him. By the time Jimmy manages to get to New York, too, she is flashing a diamond the size of a golf ball and talking airily about "when Hilary and I are married." Jimmy feels completely sunk till he accidentally encounters Hilary's svelte, blonde ex-wife, Harriet (Louise Allbritton), and realizes that she and Hilary are still in love. He executes a complicated series of maneuvers to get them back together again, most of which blow up in his face. One does work, though, eventually, and everybody lands in the right set of arms.

Peggy Ryan, as a dancer with Ray Eberle's orchestra, is an exuberant brunette edition of Betty Hutton. She and Donald put on a couple of hot routines that will have the cats in the aisles. Better dig it, kids.—Univ.

P. S.

Tenth consecutive co-starring picture for Peggy Ryan and Don O'Connor . . . Susanna Foster fans will love this one. She sings four famous and familiar numbers: "Open Thy Heart," "L'amour Toujours L'amour," "With a Song in My Heart" and "Chiri Biri Bin." During production Miss Foster was visited by members of the national music society, Sigma Alpha Iota, who presented her with an honorary membership card . . . Don hadn't yet turned 18 when this picture was being filmed and had to attend studio school three hours a day. He hated it. Would rather poke around the wardrobe department and help the crew move props during his spare time . . . Last picture for Patric Knowles for the duration. He's now civilian flight instructor at an Air Corps Cadet training school in Oxnard, California . . . "Smokey," two-year-old terrier, trained by the famous dog trainer, Henry East, literally steals the picture. He appears in 283 scenes out of a total of 321 shooting sequences . . . Smokey was almost suspended during scenes on set of interior of a Brownstone mansion in New York. Marble floor had to be faked with painted linoleum, and Smokey's claws were making such a racket the dialogue in the scenes wasn't clear. Henry East saved his doggy career by putting small pieces of rubber tubing over the toenails.

HEAVENLY BODY

This is what used to be known as "drawing room comedy." Meaning that it's witty, urbane and very, very civilized. It's a gay story of a husband who neglects his wife for a comet. Hedy Lamarr and William Powell, who made such an attractive couple in "Crossroads," are married again in "Heavenly Body." And, by the way, any resemblance between the title and Hedy is strictly coincidental. The title refers to the comet.

Professor William Whitley (William Powell) has discovered this comet sailing steadily across the heavens, and he now spends all his nights watching it through a telescope from his observatory on Mount Jefferson. This leaves Vicky (Hedy Lamarr) at home with a good book. One evening, however, she selects as reading matter a horoscope which she's had the local astrologer cast for her. It states flatly that on the twenty-third of this month her "true love" will enter her life. Vicky has always supposed that Bill was her true love, but now she begins to wonder. Maybe, somewhere waiting for her is a man who will have no interest whatever in comets. She finally tells Bill about the horoscope and moves him into the guest room till she can look over the expected arrival. Bill is bewildered and indignant, but helpless.

On the twenty-third no handsome stranger shows up, and Vicky breathes a sigh of relief as the clock strikes 12. She

ALL GOD'S CHILLUN HAVEN'T SHOES

It's nice, slipping into your snug, quilted housecoat and watching the snow collect on the windowsill. Feeling warm and secure and safe. Nice till you open a paper and read, "During this terrible winter we (Greeks) have had to bury our loved ones without clothes. Almost everyone is in rags, and for the sake of the children we had to save the clothing to protect them from the bitter cold." That comes from a letter sent the Greek War Relief last year. This year it's worse. And the awful, achy part of it is that you've probably stacks of good, warm clothes in your own attic. You will go through your house today, won't you, and send whatever blankets, shoes and clothing possible to the Greek War Relief Association, 730 Fifth Ave., New York, N. Y. . . . or to your local chapter. If you don't know its address, just drop a card to headquarters in New York, and they'll tell you. But do it now. It's so frightfully urgent.

didn't really want to leave Bill, anyway. Just then the Air Raid Warden rings the bell and points out that she's left a light burning. He also remarks that her clock is 20 minutes fast. That does it! It's still the twenty-third, and the Warden is a tall, handsome stranger named Lloyd Hunter (James Craig). This, Vicky decides, is destiny of the 18-carat variety. It's no use struggling against fate.

But Bill is prepared to struggle plenty. His attempts to convince Vicky that it's all just a broken-down fortune teller's pipe dream leads to some of the funniest lines and situations of the season. The cast includes Spring Byington, Fay Bainter and Robert Sully. I think you'll like "Heavenly Body."—M-G-M.

P. S.

New discovery Robert Sully used to be a practical engineer, got into pictures after friends insisted he take one of the offers being made to him weekly by studio execs . . . He's 6 feet, 4 inches tall, weighs 210 pounds, sent the gals swooning from the theater at the sneak preview of the picture. Scar tissue left over from earlier mishaps keep him out of the Army, though he's tried to enlist in every branch of the service . . . Celebrated visitor during production was Hilary A. St. George Saunders, combined operations recorder on the staff of Britain's Lord Louis Mountbatten. He said he was there because he wanted to watch his favorite actor—Bill Powell—at work . . . Hedy Lamarr keeps up a continuous campaign to urge friends to write daily to their friends in service. "It's so little to do—do it today and don't put it off," she tells everyone . . . Hedy revives a famous Garbo fashion deal—the pill-box hat. It's the same, but Hedy wears hers squarely on the back of her head instead of dipped over one eye . . . I SAW IT HAPPEN

I got into the Beverly Hills Hotel awfully late one night, feeling high. As I stood there talking to the bellhop, the phone rang and he asked me to answer it. "Desk, send up some cigarettes, please." "Who's this speaking?" I asked. "Simone Simon," answered the voice. "Yea, and I'm Mickey Mouse," I said.

Anyhow, I grabbed the cigarettes, brought them up and found Miss Simon at the door. "Since when do they have soldiers for bellhops?" she wanted to know. "Listen, lady," I told her, "the labor shortage is so acute they're drafting men out of the Army." Instead of being angry, she laughed and asked, "Where do you live?" "Across the hall," I said. "Splendid, won't you have breakfast with me at 10 tomorrow morning?" "I'd love to," I said, bowing out of the room in a thick haze.

I SAW IT HAPPEN

Opening a War Bond show in Duluth, Ralph Bellamy's first words were, "Folks, we're here to sell you some War Bonds, and we're gonna do it if we have to stand on our heads." The evening's entertainment progressed beautifully until almost the end, when one of the ushers brought Mr. Bellamy a slip of paper on which was written, "I'll buy a $100 bond if Mr. Bellamy will stand on his head." For a moment he stood staring at the audience with an air of disbelief, then flung off his coat. "Okay, you asked for it," he said . . . and darned if he didn't stand on his head.

Alice Pinchak, was released from his cage for one scene. Finally had to be tied in place for one quick shot, but his keeper assured bird-lovers on the set it didn't hurt him a bit . . . Technical adviser on the film was Dr. Robert S. Richardson, on the staff of Mt. Wilson Observatory. Dr. Richardson was pleased to see that the astronomers in the picture were not portrayed in the usual aged, bearded fashion.

DESTINATION TOKYO

Cary Grant looks exactly the way captains should look, even when they're in a submarine under the Pacific instead of strolling up Fifth Avenue with a girl on each arm. He manages to look handsome, dashing and efficient at the same time. He has to be efficient to be captain of of the U.S.S. Copperfin, which is the submarine in this picture. The Copperfin has a very special mission to perform. Its destination is not the Aleutians or the Solomons or any one of the other places its crew guesses. This time the destination is Tokyo.

But nobody aboard knows that when they sail from San Francisco Harbor. They head northwest the day before Christmas, 1942, with "Wolf" (John Garfield) and "Cookie" (Alan Hale) joking and ribbing "The Kid" (Bob Hutton). For some time they cruise under water during the day (how would you like to eat your Christmas dinner at the bottom of the ocean?) and only come up to re-charge their batteries at night. After all, an American plane coming over would bomb first and ask questions afterward. And, as Cookie says, you'd be just as dead if it was an American bomb that exploded.

They finally reach a rendezvous in the Aleutians where they take aboard a weather expert (John Ridgely). The weather, on a mission like this, isn't just something to use for conversational purposes. Before the sub can get back under water after Ridgely comes aboard, it is spotted by a Jap plane. The battle which ensues will have you biting your nails like mad, and if you think that's exciting, wait till the boys get to Tokyo Bay! That's when things really start happening.

There have been so many of these submarine pictures that "Destination Tokyo" won't win any Oscars for originality. It's lively entertainment though, and it is helped considerably by John Garfield and Alan Hale. By now Alan must feel more at home in a sub than he does on land. Others in the cast are Dane Clark, Tom Tully, William Prince, Warren Douglas and John Forsythe.—War.

P. S.

No visitors were allowed on the set during production . . . Cary Grant, John Garfield, Dane Clark and the rest of the cast were under the strictest surveillance at all times, because certain parts of the picture were a military secret until Navy authorities gave their okay to release the film . . . One of the technical directors was Commander Dudley Walker Morton, who received a Distinguished Service Cross from General MacArthur, the Navy Cross with two stars and a Presidential Citation for captaining a submarine that put 20 Jap ships under the sea, blew up a Jap sub and destroyed an unannounced number of enemy fighting craft . . . During production, it was discovered this wasn't the first time Grant had been in a submarine. When he was 13 and running messages between the lines, he went out on patrol with a British sub during the thick of the fighting. At that time, though, he didn't have to remember all the technical names tossed at him in the script. Spent his lunch hours in the Green Room muttering them over and over to himself, so they'd come naturally when the cameras started rolling . . . The sub set was on rollers, and the movement was violent. Seasickness was an everyday occurrence, with one or another of the cast tottering off every once in a while to rest . . . For one scene on the deck of the sub, Cary had to be dramatically serious while a prop man perched on a 20-foot stepladder squirted water in his face with a hose. Grant commented, "That guy on the ladder worries me. He just sits there dead-pan and squirts me in the face. It's tough to keep from laughing." . . . A like experience was Bob Hutton's. Extremely ticklish, it was all he could do to remain perfectly still while Bill Prince "operated" on him for appendicitis . . . the film has many authentic seascapes, and the entire production was made under Naval supervision.

NO TIME FOR LOVE

Maybe it's the manpower shortage, but the Hollywood heroines are certainly pursuing the heroes lately. Jean Arthur chased John Wayne all over the West's great open spaces in "A Lady Takes A Chance." Olivia de Havilland practically held a shotgun on Robert Cummings to get him to marry her in "Princess O'Rourke." And now in "No Time For Love," Claudette Colbert pursues Fred MacMurray the length and breadth of Manhattan and under the East River besides. It's boy meets girl in the comedy manner, and it would cheer up a case of acute melancholia. Go see it, quick.

Claudette as Katherine Grant, photographer for a magazine called "Mirror," thinks marrying for love went out with the smelling salts era. That is, she thinks so till she gets an assignment to photograph some "sandhogs" at work digging a tunnel under the East River. The sandhogs are not pleased to see the beautiful Miss Grant. "Dames in a tunnel is a jinx" is the way they put it. Katherine promptly proves their point by causing one of them named Ryan (Fred MacMurray) to fall off a ladder. Then she has to scoop him out of the way of some machinery to keep him from being killed. When he comes to, instead of being impressed and grateful, he tells her it was all her fault in the first place. And adds that she's not his type and might as well stop making eyes at him. The outraged Miss Grant retaliates by announcing furiously that she has a chair at home in her bedroom which has more personality than Mr. Ryan. Result: Ryan shows up that night to look over the chair.

Katherine is lost from then on. She moons around till her sister, Hoppy (Ilka Chase) says she has LOVE spelled out on her forehead in neon lights. Katherine denies being in love but hires Ryan as her assistant on the theory that the more she sees of him the less she'll like him. "It won't work!" Hoppy says. It doesn't.

Richard Haydn is wonderful as a vague but effective Cupid. June Havoc plays one of Ryan's girl friends whom Katherine describes as a blondined case of arrested development. Claudette and Fred are both at their best. It's a funny show.—Par.

P. S.

Wooden, 130-foot tunnel reproduction was one of most complicated in screen history. Construction was so ingenious that technical adviser Charles Wall, inspecting engineer of all tunnel projects in N. Y., threw out 20-year-old method of structural support and ordered a variation of this plan for Brooklyn-Battery tunnel . . . Only experienced sandhog in cast was Rod Cameron, who'd worked underground for five years in New York state and Calif., before movies nabbed him . . . During filming of tunnel cave-in, Colbert and MacMurray wallowed around in mud for 10 days. After last scene Director Leisen dove head-on into the mud from the camera-platform, just to prove he sympathized with all they'd endured. Gave each actor a glassful of mud for remembrance—with a hundred-dollar bill attached! . . . Claudette was stoic until last day when she broke down and sputtered, "I'll never have a mud facial pack for the rest of my life!" . . . Richard Haydn, playing puckish composer-pianist with yen for food, had to eat constantly during production. By end of picture, he had consumed a tray of canapes, three chicken legs, half a dozen apples, six plates of corned beef and cabbage, plus boiled potatoes and 19 bananas!

Mobs of people crowded the steps of the treasury department in Washington. Dozens of Hollywood actors and actresses were there, too, for the big bond rally, but the favorites were Abbott and Costello. When a red-headed girl walked up to their booth to buy a bond, Costello turned to Abbott and said, "You know, I've never kissed a red head." "Well," Abbott asked, "what are you waiting for?" "Nothin'," Costello answered, and coolly proceeded to kiss her.

CAN VITAMINS RESTORE NATURAL COLOR TO YOUR GRAY OR STREAKED HAIR?

Here's how you can test the amazing Panates 2-Way Double Action Anti-Gray Hair Vitamin Treatment and Get Satisfactory Results or Get Your Money Back for the Asking.

You've read and heard about the latest miracle of vitamin science—the anti-gray hair vitamins. Now test the original double action anti-gray hair vitamin formula, PANATES, on a trial offer so fair it calls for immediate acceptance.

NOTHING TO FEAR

REMEMBER, PANATES ISN'T A HAIR DYE. You can test PANATES whether you now artificially color your hair or not, because Anti-Gray Hair Vitamins act from underneath. Soon you may notice you need less and less hair coloring. But let me tell you what this amazing discovery is, how it works, and why so many thousands of women and men who once accepted the double vitamin PANATES treatment, this same trial offer, now continue with PANATES because of the changes in hair color they see taking place.

Tests reported by a national magazine on small groups of gray haired women and men, ranging in ages from 21 to 60, while too recent for conclusive evidence, have shown startling results. These people were given fairly large daily doses of certain vitamins, and in from 1 to 6 months 88% of them showed first signs of results.

Previously, tests with animals showed that when these animals did not get these vitamins in their daily food, their hair turned white. Then, when they were fed adequate amounts of these vitamins, their hair became natural in color again.

The tests on people showed that age had no bearing on the results. The quickest action was obtained by a man in his fifties. The man's hair started to turn from gray to a natural black in only one short month. The slowest case was a girl in her twenties. It took 6 months for her to get any signs of results.

Panates give not only the anti-gray hair vitamin, but wheat germ oil (Vitamin E) as well. Panates actually is a healthful food supplement. It works by giving your system a source for the hair color vitamins that may be lacking in your daily diet and, if so, should literally feed natural color through the hair roots to check gray spread, to give the hair new lively lustre, and to bring new hope for restoration of normal hair color once again. While too new to guarantee 100% results, we can and do make a very fair money back trial offer. We are certainly making it easy for you to test the PANATES Treatment yourself to see what PANATES' two vitamins may do for you in your fight for the happiness of lovely looking natural hair color beauty.

PANATES SAFE! No Mess, No Fuss.

PANATES is absolutely harmless. It is a natural way to seek natural hair color. It is concentrated food elements, vitamins. PANATES action is simply by supplying to the system a source for certain healthful vitamins which may be lacking in your own daily diet. You can test PANATES in the confidence these vitamins are taken by countless thousands the nation over.

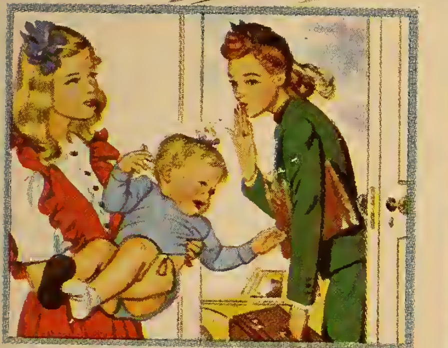
Dear Sis:—
Your baby has given me a beauty tip—and I've got myself a Marine!



A BREAK—THAT'S WHAT IT WAS . . . when you asked me to stay with baby Susie while you visited her Daddy out on the Coast. I was staying home darn near every night, anyway. Lonesome as heck. But how was I to know what a break it would be!

THAT BLESSED DOCTOR of yours! I took Susie to him for her check-up as you told me. (She's fine!) As we left I wailed, "I'd tackle almost any beauty routine, Doctor, to have a skin like that baby's!" "Regular, gentle cleansings with mild, pure Ivory is the ticket for YOU! It has no coloring, medication, or strong perfume that might be irritating. It couldn't be milder or purer. Might make a world of difference to your complexion."

QUICK AS A BUNNY I changed to gentle Ivory care. Boy did it WORK! Not long ago, Kay brought over a couple of Marine Lieutenants. I got the good-looking one—and I do mean GOT! He raves about my slick, smoother complexion. Wants to announce our engagement when you get back! Hurry!

TO OUR READERS...

Do you remember the story about the tiny little salt mill that would start grinding out salt on command—and wouldn't stop until you said the magic word? And if you didn't know the word, it was really murder—even if you liked salt! . . . I used to think that story was solid, even though I just take a little salt on my celery. But now I've met Beverly Linet, and I have a real story to tell! . . . Beverly is right out of a fairy tale herself. She has been president of several fan clubs and is utterly, utterly devoted to movies. If anything ever happened to Hollywood, I suspect she would go up in a soundless, invisible spiral of smoke. . . . For, for better than salt, Beverly grinds out information about movies and stars! She is so awfully well informed that I sometimes think it must hurt to be so smart. With a good stiff question, you can start her grinding out wisdom. And I have never yet seen anyone able to stop her! . . . In all fairy tales, the characters always live happily ever afterwards. To ensure Beverly's fate, we have revived our old Information Desk. Send all your questions about the stars and movies to Beverly Linet, Information Desk, MODERN SCREEN, 149 Madison Avenue, New York 16, N. Y. And don't tell me you don't believe in fairy tales. I didn't either—not until I met Beverly!

Lana Turner

Part 1 of her life story, in which she comes to H'wood in a mud-covered car with its side caved in and not a thought of movie-making in her head!

The pretty little girl engrossed in the paper doll cut-out was Julia Jean Mildred Frances Turner. She had just come in from school. Mother was out—working at the beauty parlor. Luncheon dishes were piled on the sink ready to be washed and dried. The dishes were Julia Jean's job. But between dirty dishes and paper dolls—such a choice for a little girl to make.

She thought, bother the dishes. Mother won't be in for a long while yet. Before she knew it, a key was clicking the door. Whew! And the dishes not done! Julia Jean took flight. Paper doll, scissors, guilty conscience and all, she made for the bedroom and dived under the bed.

Mother called. She kept quiet. She could tell by the voice, by the hurrying footsteps, by the way doors were being opened and shut, that Mother was scared. She longed to call out that she was all right but, having started this game of hide-and-seek, she was stuck with it. The outer door opened and closed. Mother'd gone to ask the man in the lobby whether Julia Jean had come home from school. And the man would say yes. Well—it wouldn't be long now—

Back came Mother, headed straight for the bedroom, peered under the bed and yanked her darling out. Having first made sure that she was sound in wind and limb, Mother then proceeded to give her what was coming to her, after which she left the room. She always did that—the sudden realization checked Julia Jean's tears—every time she spanked her, she'd go right out of the room. Why? Curiosity got the better of her. She opened the door a crack. There sat mother, head down on her arms, bawling her eyes out. Julia Jean couldn't bear it. Next minute she was down on her knees, burrowing her head in her mother's lap, crying as no spanking had ever made her cry. Mother picked her up, cradled and hushed her like a baby, talked to her softly, kissed the swollen eyes, bathed the tear-stained face with water. Then she turned her round—

Remember this? It's an old favorite of ours, snapped when Lana lived in Wallace, Idaho, 100 mis. from nearest movie!

Made theatrical debut at 3 when she crashed large charity fashion show, in which her mom was a model. Her dad, vaudevillian before turning engineer, taught her dancing, let her join his act.

In 1937, she was a starlet of 16, lived modestly with her mom in tiny apt. Romance rumors sprang up when she and Ronnie Reagan were seen dining steadily in War. Green Room.

"Now, young lady," she said with a catch in her voice, "go wash those dishes."

Her mother was the center of Julia Jean's universe. Mothers generally are, when their children are young. But this was different. Her mother had to be where Julia Jean could look at her. If she left the room, Julia Jean would kick and scream and raise general cain.

It wasn't protection she craved. She was neither a fearful child nor a shy one. She met people with poise and dropped them her little curtsies. But the way she needed Mother was the way she needed light and air.

Before long, she had to adjust herself to the fact that they weren't Siamese twins. But Mother remained the focal point of her being. The bond between them was so warm and strong that, whatever went wrong, Mother's presence could make it come right. For instance, she hated performing at school functions. She felt as if she were drowning—till she found Mother's face in the audience. Their eyes would meet, and Mother would smile, and her smile was like a hand pulling Julia Jean out of the water. After that it was easy. She'd just say her piece or whatever it was straight to Mother. Even when she'd got to be a big girl in her teens.

The worst time of her life was when Mother left her in Stockton and went to work in San Francisco, and they only saw each other week-ends. If anyone had told her a thing like that could happen, she wouldn't have believed it. Or if she had, she'd have wanted to lie down and die.

Before that, everything was lovely. Of course she couldn't remember much about Wallace—the little Idaho mining town where she'd been born. There was the house—she remembered that—gray and two-storied, with steps leading up to the porch. She used to pretend she was a queen, and the top step was her throne and nobody else was allowed to sit there unless she liked them very much, in which case she'd graciously invite them to share the throne.

She remembered the abandoned chocolate pop factory, where she'd learned the meaning of terror. With the door open, it was a friendly place, and she'd loved to climb up and down the spiral staircase because it made her think of enchanted (Continued on page 34)

Signed contract with her long-time favorite name, Lana. Immediately branded "sweater girl," she was given several tiny roles, emerged one of most promising actresses of 1937!

Discovered sipping a soda at drugstore counter by a talent scout. Lana was immediately whipping into the movies without ounce of training. First role was with Lina Perry (above) in "They Won't Forget." Modeling experience gave her courage to face cameras.

Between scenes of "Love Finds Andy Hardy," Lana, Judy Garland and Mickey Rooney had to go to school on set. Chums called her "Judy," enemies tortured her with "Carrots."

In 1938, she got into hot water with Board of Education because she played too hard, studied too little. Warned her career was at stake, she vowed to settle down to work, lay off nightclubbing.

houses in fairy tales, and she was always hoping a cute little elf in a pointed cap might poke his head round the corner and play with her. But one day the door blew shut, and she couldn't get it open, and she was alone with the dark coming at her from all sides, and her voice was screaming and her fists pounding wildly against wood, but she knew they'd never hear her—never, never, never—and she'd be alone in the dark until she died.

It couldn't have been more than a few minutes before they came—a few minutes of such tearing anguish for the child behind the door that, to this day, she sickens at the smell of chocolate pop.

She remembered, too, the "mystery of the vanishing rings."

Mildred Turner had been little more than a child herself—not quite 17—when the baby was born. She loved dressing her up. It was like dressing a doll, only more fun. Whatever you put on her, she just seemed to look cuter. Such a dainty, fussy little thing, too, as she started growing older. If she dirtied her hand, you couldn't get away with just washing it. She had to have a bath. And fresh clothes from the skin out. "Now Jujean's all clean," she'd crow. Julia Jean Mildred Frances—that's how she was baptized—and they called her Julia Jean. When teachers dropped the Jean, she'd correct them gravely. "My mother doesn't like Julia all by herself."

Late every afternoon Mother'd bathe and dress her and send her to the corner to meet Daddy, due home from his work with a mining company. Once mother fastened a sparkly pin to her dress. "That's an amethyst," she said. "Your birthstone and mine. You can wear it today just to make Daddy laugh."

Amethyst meant nothing to Jujean, but she loved the way it glittered and kept pestering mother to let her wear it again. Nothing doing. So one day she slipped back into the house and tiptoed to the bedroom. The amethyst was gone, but two rings—sparkly and plain—lay on the dresser. Also a curly feather. She stuck the rings on her thumb, the feather in her hair and walked out like a lady to meet her daddy.

You could call it the mystery of the vanishing rings. Jujean returned, complete with Daddy and feather, and mother laughed at the plume cocked rakishly in he hair. "Rings, too," she said, sticking her thumb up. But there were no rings. Daddy ran out and raked the stree from door to corner. The rings had disappeared. An Jujean got spanked.

"She doesn't rate it," said Daddy. "You gave he the pin in the first place."

"She's got to learn not to touch things that don't be Filled a bathing suit nicely on diet of pies, cake, everything she liked! Counteracted with tennis, swimming, riding, hiking.

Between pictures she caught up on her painting, designed many of her own chic togs. Appeared with Va. Grey and Ann Rutherford in "Dramatic School."

In '39 studio announced Lana was new "It" girl, successor to Harlow. Right, with Lew Ayres, Tom Brown, Ann Rutherford in "These Glamour Girls."

long to her. Her hands are always into everything."

After the first shock, Jujean took it philosophically. Mother loved her very much. This was a fact more firmly established than that night follows day. So if Mother spanked her, she must have been very bad—and that was that.

Julia Jean had been six when they left Wallace for San Francisco. "They call it the city of the Golden Gate," Daddy told her. For weeks she dreamed about the Golden Gate—sparkly and beautiful and towering to the sky, with spikes sticking up, and a pearl at the end of each spike, like the pearls in mother's necklace. But when they got there—

"Where's the Golden Gate, Daddy?"

"There it is, honey. They call it that because it's wide and deep and has room for lots of ships to come in."

"But it's only water!" She burst into tears and refused to be comforted. Life had handed Julia Jean her first lemon.

Daddy found work in San Francisco. But the Turners thought it too big and confusing a place for a child used to the freedom of a small town. So Mother and Julia Jean went to Stockton where her godmother lived and, as children will, Julia Jean accepted the new pattern of her days—with

Although her salary was sky-rocketing in '40, she economically washed her stockings, wove them into rag rugs when they wore out. Below, with John Shelton in "We Who Are Young."

Lana, 20, was reportedly engaged to local attorney Greg Bautzer (left) when she suddenly eloped with Artie Shaw, 30, in 1940.

1941. "Ziegfeld Girl" with J. Cooper. Of all fans, oddest was sailor who wrote once a year describing all he'd seen; never requested reply!

She and Artie met on set of "Dancing Co-Ed," married several months later. After four and a half months with temperamental Artie in his Beverly Hills home, Lana sued for divorce.

There followed a roster of suitors. One-time head man was Vic Mature, with whom she did a brother-and-sister act, wearing twin play clothes, swim suits, piling up publicity notices.

Mad for dogs of all shapes and breeds, Lana had a kennel of six purps, ranging from Great Danes to Pekes. Also collected elephants—miniature! In '42, really "arrived" playing opposite Gable in "Somewhere I'll Find You."

In 1941, it looked like the real thing with Tony Martin, and people predicted a merger. But unpredictable Lana changed her mind about him, too!

Daddy coming for week-ends, with Mother at the beauty shop and herself at the convent school.

She hadn't liked the idea of school at all. But by now she'd found out that certain things happened, no matter how much you kicked and screamed, so she'd pretty well given up that routine. And after a while, she decided it wasn't so bad. Mother took her to school in the morning and met her for lunch. And the blue uniforms with their little white collars were so pretty. And she grew to love the nuns. In fact, before she got through, she loved everything about the convent except homework.

They'd been living in Stockton for two years when suddenly all the bad things came at once. Julia Jean caught scarlet fever and had to be taken to the hospital for contagious diseases. She'd never been away from her mother at night. Being away from your mother at night was awful. The hospital was fenced with iron palings. Every day mother'd come out to stand by the fence and wave, and her mouth would shape the words, "I love you." But Julia Jean wanted her close. Every day she'd leave a dish of orange sherbet at the office. (Continued on page 77)

At recent Laraine Day shindig, Reagans copped prize for insane pillow dance: giant, inky spider. Invitation warned of snagged nylons, shredded hems. (Spectacled one is Hollywood agent.)

At Eureka, Moon's constant beef was, "I cram my head off for a B. That featherbrained lug (Ronnie) never turns to pg. 2 and gets a C+." Profs would kid, "Why waste our time keeping him here 5 yrs."

"Kid days" to Dutch (Ronnie) Reagan and Moon recall following drawing-room scene: Pop at one end of table hunched over evening paper. Dutch, Moon and Mom at other end with funnies, stifling giggles. On table: Popperful of corn, basket of apples, salted crackers.

The Reagan Boys

By Kirtley Baskette

Ronnie and Moon swipe each other's suits, steal each other's thunder, go into an Irish tangle at the drop of a word. And yet . . .

Back in the 1930's, Midwest football fans used to tune in on a regular radio puzzler every Saturday afternoon. One second they'd hear a snappy sports announcer sign off the Notre Dame-Minnesota game in South Bend, Indiana—and the next second the same excited voice would crackle: "Now, folks, here we are at Ames, Iowa, for the Iowa State-Nebraska game—and what a battle royal this will be! The Cornhuskers are trotting on the field . . . they're lining up . . . the referee tosses the coin . . . there goes the whistle! . . ."

What stumped the radio fans was how this sports announcer guy, Dutch Reagan, could skip across a couple of states in a couple of seconds!

They didn't know Dutch Reagan had a brother, Moon, who was so close to this bud that he talked exactly like him.

That was back when Dutch and Moon Reagan craved to be a couple of Ted Husings. Since then, Dutch has made his more refined name, Ronald, famous as a movie star, and now as Captain Ronald Reagan of the U. S. Army. And Moon, whose Mom calls him Neil, has done all right, too, as a Hollywood radio executive. But the Reagan brothers, Moon and Dutch, are still as close as two peas in a pod—and at the same time as different as day and night.

Moon still talks exactly like Ronnie, and he has those same laugh-wrinkled Reagan eyes that you can spot a mile off. They wear each other's suits and steal each other's underwear, because they weigh exactly the same and measure alike, even down to shoe sizes. Moon and Dutch live a couple of blocks apart on the same street, roam in and out of each other's houses and raid one another's Victory Gardens. They get together on all holidays and every Saturday night. They huddle with each other on every business move and kibitz on family affairs. But Moon is a (Continued on page 70)

Journey for Jean Pierre

One day in a café in Morocco, his friends will wonder why he wastes his short leaves standing alone at a bar instead of dancing.

Every morning during their N. Y. stay, Pierre ordered sumptuous breakfast, awakened Maria with steaming tray. He's heir to fortune of family owning world-wide Grand Maison de Blanc shops.

By Cynthia Miller

It was a crisp September night in New York. A taxi slithered to a halt in front of the Sherry Netherlands hotel, and a tall blond young man got out. He dashed into the hotel and strode toward the elevators.

"Just a minute, Mr. Aumont," said the desk clerk. "There's a letter for you."

"A letter?" Jean Pierre looked puzzled. "You have the night mail deliveries in America then?"

"This didn't come by mail," the clerk explained.

Jean Pierre took it and started again toward the elevator. But as he recognized the handwriting on the envelope, he came to an abrupt halt. That was Maria's writing! He had left his bride alone in their suite two hours before. Something must have happened! An accident—the hospital! Visions of Maria, pale and near death on a hospital bed floated madly through his mind. His heart pounded uncomfortably in his chest. Quickly he tore the letter open. . . .

"Jean Pierre, my darling," it said. "This is the first evening since our marriage that (Continued on page 93)

Pierre's sailing was postponed two weeks while he had necessary inoculations. Expected to land in North Africa as liaison officer. Maria begged to be sent there over holidays, so she could see him.

Out of "Cross of Lorraine" uniform into Fighting French gear. Studied English for two years, learned American ditties from buddies in cast.

Dreams of a post-war life together include a co-starring play on the Paris stage. Already Maria's boning up on her French grammar and diction, for a solid hour each night before she turns out her light.

When an astrologer once told Maria her cast name in a certain film was unlucky, she raised heaven and earth to change it! Lonesome, she's burying herself in work on "Ali Baba and the 40 Thieves."

During day between scenes of "A Guy Named Joe," Van plotted evening's program. Was late getting out of work, hustled straight home to start dressing.

Dries off after shower by racing around house half-garbed. Calls all his gals "Stupid," prefers 'em in black, sweaters, with long hairdos. Nixes doodads.

Van often finds himself competing with Hope or Benny for radio-fan Gloria's attention. Goes for her unconscious stock phrase "how perfectly wonderful!"

Always gets jittery dressing for date. Permanently scarred by one never-explained stand-up. Takes full hour, spends long moments in scented bubble bath.

Along with Van Johnson and Gloria De Haven—from Saturday night primping to their front porch good night!

Dresses in half hour, funnies included. Adores Li'l Abner, can't understand why he scorns Daisy Mae. Reading list also includes best sellers, movie mags.

Collects cashmere sweaters, keeps most of his togs at Keenan Wynn's where he practically lives. At first hole, socks go to charity; he can't mend!

Gloria sets her hair nightly, has weekly shampoo. A one-time nail-biter, she stopped when studio stormed. Now prides herself on manicures, does own pedicuring.

Strictly feminine, she bans flat heels except with slacks, always wears gloves. Saves wolf jacket from Pop for special dates, such as one with Van tonight.

First thing he asked for when he came to after auto smash-up was gum. Pal Evie Wynn smiles new supplies out of drugstore clerks, turns take over to Van!

Inexhaustible on phone, once chatted 1 hr. 20 mins. Mom imposes no blue laws, but daughter wisely stays in while working in "Two Sisters and a Sailor."

Since both are always hungry, first stop was dinner. Conversation centered about work, chops, chicken, steak. Chums claim they once lingered 15 mins. over subject of spaghetti!

Later dropped in on Keenan Wynn's where Van gave baby, Neddy-Poo, a record album. Often sits in on Ned's music hour, warbles along with "Mother Goose" records.

Up from 160 to 200 since accident, Van can't understand why he gains on one meal a day. Overlooks Henry VIII-ish portions, incessant nibbles and Pepsis!

Gloria kept him waiting 15 mins. Hep to women's ways, Van never raised a brow, philosophically hauled out a book. Promises to bring writing kit next time!

Host Keenan was entertaining at Canteen, didn't get home till guests were leaving. Mid-evening, kids sat around fireplace and told ghost stories in dark room. Later Van gave rumba lesson.

Constantly josh each other, have such a picnic they hate to say good-by. Van's specialty: a devastating imitation of Gloria's hip-swaying walk and continual running fingers thru hair!

Jim backed car to Verna's window, chucked things in back seat, carted them to his apt. on eve of marriage. Slept in car. Next A.M. friends found him on porch begging coffee 'n razor.

You know the type—big, shy, quiet. Holds a tennis racket more tenderly than a girl. That's Jim Brown.

Jim Brown is a contradictory guy. He made his first hit as the love-'em-and-leave-'em Tex of "Air Force," and played it as if he'd been playing Tex all his life. The only similarity is coincidental. He is from Texas.

Till he met the one he wanted to marry, girls scared him. He was too bashful to kiss them. Every time he found himself dressing for a date, he'd wonder what the heck he'd made it for. He got good and sick of the funny little smile in a girl's eyes as he bade her a kissless goodnight. He got good and sick of being told, "You're the sweetest guy, Lefty."

"And the damnedest fool," he'd mutter, striding off into the night.

What did he want to bother with girls for anyway? More fun taking a show in with a fellow, (Continued on page 110)

"The Miracle of Morgan's Creek"

They're knee-deep in dilemmas. And suddenly a miracle whirls Bracken and lovely, crazy Betty up into the clouds.

STORY When the miracle happened over at Morgan's Creek, the editor of the local paper called the Governor while half a thousand people kept shuffling through the dim, quiet street outside his window and more kept pouring in every hour, every half hour, every minute. It was the biggest thing that ever happened in Morgan's Creek.

"Morgan's Creek," the Governor yelled over the phone, "are you sure that's in my state?"

"Of course, it's in your state," the editor said. "I voted for you, didn't I?"

"Let's skip politics," the Governor said. "This is absolutely sensational."

"Colossal," the editor said.

"Terrific!"

"Unparalleled!"

"All right," the Governor said, "give me the whole story now. I want it right from the beginning."

"Well," said the editor, "there's this girl in our town. Trudy Kockenlocker—"

Next problem was transporting all the workers to and from the spot. "Busses" was the only possible answer, so a system was set up. First bus left from Paramount's front door at 6:30 loaded with the technical crew, camera helpers, prop men, painters and carpenters. They were to go first and get the day's set ready for work. At 7:00 every morning, the staff bus pulled away from the studio filled with Mr. Sturges, the head camera man, script

1. Trudy (Betty Hutton) ditches her patient and dependable suitor, Norval Jones (Eddie Bracken), for servicemen's farewell dance after Pop Kockenlocker (William Demarest) forbids her going to it.

2. Trudy chugs off in Norval's car, promises to meet him later at theater. At dance, slips, falls on head. Dazed, she goes along with mob when one G. I. suggests they all get married. They use aliases.

3. Trudy, foggy about the night before, jounces up to theater lobby at 8 A.M. next morning, finds Norval asleep in corner. Officer Kockenlocker is ready to pound him to pulp when he drives Trudy home.

4. Suddenly things come clear. Trudy wails out she's married. Little later she finds she's mother-to-be. Since it's impossible to find husband, she and Sis (Diana Lynn) plan to get Norval to propose.

5. Norval does propose, but Trudy, touched by the guy's sweetness and his sincerity, moans, between sobs, "I just can't do this to you," —and out comes the story. Pop storms out to see what's wrong.

6. Kockenlocker forces marriage, because of gossip in town. To avoid bigamy, Norval tries ruse, fails. Enraged justice of peace calls out police, F.B.I. Trudy pulls light switch, escapes with Norval.

7. After they're nabbed for speeding, Pop learns truth, claims Norval as his prisoner, plans another escape. Together they lift $900 from bank where Norval worked, stuff $900 in War Bonds in vault.

8. The mounting dilemma is cleared up by near-miracle. As Morgan Creek settles down again to normal humdrum, another miracle is wrought—and Trudy and Norval are caught up in whirl of happiness.

Judy Cried

It was fun and grinding work. It was headaches and thrills and comradeship and laughter and a few tears. It was nerve-racking and heart-lifting. It was the Hollywood Bond Cavalcade, and Judy wouldn't have missed it for the world.

Its meaning was summed up in the words of a soldier. When they played San Francisco, two rows down front were reserved for a group of young servicemen back from North Africa, all decorated for conspicuous bravery in action beyond the line of duty. Jimmy Cagney departed from the regular program to pay them tribute. Each performer saluted them as he came out. After the show, the boys went backstage.

"I'd like to thank you for myself and my buddies," one of them said to Judy. "It's a great job you're doing."

"That's hard to take, coming from someone like you. You've really done a job."

"This is just as important, and don't you forget

Even though Judy rode in a jeep in all the 16 cities visited on tour, she never got her fill! Would like nothing better than owning one herself. Above, with Betty Hutton, Greer Garson, Mickey Rooney and Lucille Ball.

Crowds flooded Los Angeles station to see troupe off. By tour's end they had been gaped at by over 7 million-fans—even on extra-curricular sightseeing tours! War Finance Com. head came to say goodby to Judy, Kyser, Ball.

Gang joshed all the way across the country, with Harpo Marx and Mickey Rooney the ring-leaders. One day Harpo surprised Judy and Doris Merrick at their dinner by appearing in waiter's garb, serving ice-cold coffee!

Admission to rallies was a $25 War Bond, offered buyers elaborate

Judy wished the whole country could have heard the simple fervor of those words. BUY BONDS! cry the billboards. BUY BONDS! cry the radio voices. But this was different. He'd been there. He was going back. He knew. Brother, how we need that stuff! It made you feel that buying bonds was like putting more shells in his gun, so he could shoot instead of being shot—like sending an airplane to cover him, so he could come back and live, not stay there and die. It was like an urgent, personal SOS, and you could either answer it or turn your back. Brother, was she glad she'd come on this trip!

The Hollywood Victory Committee had hesitated about including her. She'd returned from a five weeks' camp tour just before the Cavalcade started out. Was she too tired to go along? they asked. To Judy that (Continued on page 102)

A Guy Named Joe

Joe Cotten's got large and gusty appetites . . . likes people in droves, clothes in stacks, books piled to the ceiling and gags by the carload.

The day Joe turned up at M-G-M for "Gaslight," gateman yelled, "Hey, you can't park here. This lot's for talent." (That's Mrs. Cotten above.)

On the set of "Gaslight" the other day, someone asked Joseph Cotten what he thought about Ingrid Bergman.

"She's a girl who doesn't look or act like anyone else in Hollywood," promptly replied Joe. "And she's not a bit worried about it!"

Joe Cotten might well have been talking about himself. Like Ingrid, he's one of the greatest naturals to hit Hollywood in years.

I doubt if any star in Hollywood is getting as big a bang out of being a movie star as Joseph Cotten. He's busier than a brace of bird dogs, starting one picture before another is finished, running his Sunday radio show, hopping here and there for OWI broadcasts, OPA broadcasts, service benefits, bond rallies and what have you. He just wound up Orson (Continued on page 88)

In N. Y. years ago, when Joe was green as spinach, great Belasco signed him for life but died week later. (At Players with Mrs. Jack Lighter.)

Says 1st person to call him movie actor was pal Welles. Joe agreed, but after glimpse of 1st screen test felt "like Sunday morning with a hangover." Like Bergman, he's never been typed. Plays everything from hero to villain.

Donald O'Connor

IT COMES UP LOVE!

It all began when the Ford-Ford got a flat in Chinatown. After that, it was a heady whirl of stuffed pandas, Kwazy Wabbitt and puddle-jumpers for Don and Gwen!

By Nancy Winslow Squire

Any stage on which Donald O'Connor now works is strictly a love set. He doesn't exactly glow, but one gets that general impression. When the luncheon hour approaches, his eyes have a way of measuring—not the fastest distance to the commissary, as used to be the case—but the most likely prospect loitering in the vicinity. The prospect should have an open, honest face and an extra gas coupon.

First, Don locates the director and finds out what his afternoon schedule is. Usually he is booked tighter than a model's bathing suit. Then he approaches the character with the open, honest face and says, "Going into town this afternoon about two-thirty, huh?"

If the prospect says, "Could be," Don counters quickly, "If I gave you a gas ticket, would you mind going down to Los Angeles High School and getting my girl? She's coming out to the set this afternoon . . . if I can arrange transportation."

The deal closed, Don charges toward the commissary looking like the first fruits of the dimout repeal. Gwennie will be there all afternoon, oh happy, happy stuff.

Would you like to know, confidentially, how to fall in love in the O'Connor manner? Well, first of all you should know a good many people, as Mr. O'Connor does. You should have met them in practically every town in the United States. And you should remember them, no matter where nor how you happened to meet them—as Hepcat O'Connor does.

To begin at the beginning: the O'Connor act once worked on the same bill with The Duffins, Matthew and Joyce, dancing (Continued on page 97)

When asked how many times he's been in love, Don answers "too many." He and Gwen Carter are Hollywood's youngest engaged couple!

Years' experience with circus made Don a hep singer, dancer, acrobat, trapeze aerialist, comedian, song and skit writer. Favorite stunt's lying down! He's now performing in "This is the Life" with Dick Nichols.

Laddie Comes Home

There should be a wonderful, aching happiness in coming home. And yet, how could there be?

Alan Ladd carried in his billfold a photostatic copy of the papers which state that Corporal Alan W. Ladd has been honorably discharged from the Army of the United States. Of all the documents Alan has signed, that is probably the only one to which he was totally, absolutely, heartachingly unwilling to append his signature.

Mustered out at the same time Laddie was, were three buddies from his outfit. One from the Aleutians and two from Guadalcanal. At Alan's invitation the trio went home with the Ladds that first non-Army night the men had known for many, many months. They were rather quiet, after the manner of those who have a great deal on their minds.

After dinner they sat around and had a session . . . just as they had grown accustomed to doing in the Army. The focal point in the Ladd household was the fireplace, whereas it had formerly been the iron bed of some hospitable PFC.

Instead of a crap game in the corner to furnish background barracks music, the radio played softly.

"Tomorrow morning," said one of the men without particular enthusiasm, "I'm going to sleep until noon. No reveille, boy! Isn't that something?" Then he glanced at Sue Ladd. "That is," he added, "if I won't be in your way in the den."

(Because the Ladd house is small and compact, the three guests had been allotted to the three lounges. They tossed coins for location. One drew the lounge before the living room fireplace; one drew the sitting room lounge, and the third won the lounge in the den . . . practically a private palace to the soldier who had spent a year in barracks with numerous and sundry other characters in khaki.)

The second guest spoke up: "When I get into civilian clothes, ya know what I'm going to do? I'm going to look up the biggest, brawniest M.P. I can find, and I'm going to follow him for five city blocks, whistling."

"As for me," said the third guest, "I'm going to buy myself a tweed sport jacket that will make Bing Crosby's wildest wardrobe item look more colorless than rain on a slate roof. Sox—Argyle plaid! Ties—nothing with a design smaller than a G.I. soup kettle!" He knocked the ashes out of his pipe and squinted (Continued on page 114)

Laddie's puttin' that pistol down for doctor's role in "And Now Tomorrow." Studio gave him three mos. to recover, but Sue's home cooking is bringing him around quickly.

GOOD NEWS

Rice and old shoes for Susan Peters and Dick Quine, a blue layette for the Holdens!

As this month's GOOD NEWS goes to press, Hollywood is still talking about the following things:

The marriage of Susan Peters to Richard Quine.

The birth of a son, Peter, to Lt. and Mrs. William Holden (Brenda Marshall).

The return to Hollywood of Captain Clark Gable, and the fact that he has been sending roses to Virginia Bruce, thereby running competition to the Coast Guard in the person of Cesar Romero.

A rumor also gained ground in the land of romance that CUPID IS STUPID, to wit:

Hollywood's Little Poker Face, Deanna Durbin, announced that she and Lt. Vaughn Paul had separated and that she would eventually seek a divorce. When Deanna was planning her wedding, she refused to discuss the details with any but her intimate friends and members of her family, explaining that marriage was a sacred rite and not a topic to be tossed lightly from tongue to tongue. That she views divorce with the same fastidiousness is indicated by her current silence. She has made no public comment aside from her original terse announcement of her intentions.

By the time you read this, it is to be hoped that Robert Walker and Jennifer Jones will have reconciled. After all, they have two adorable small sons, and their careers have developed simultaneously after a good many years of cheerfully shared struggle. As a team they have more common interests than either could ever hope to perfect with a new marital partner. The thing that caused the trouble in the first place was a combination of malicious gossip and a headstrong man's refusal to realize how easily an innocent action could be misunderstood.

Both Bob and Jennifer are currently working in "Since You Went Away," the Claudette Colbert starring picture. Most of their scenes tell the story of ripening love between a boy and a girl. You might keep your fingers crossed in the hope that the cinematic romance rekindles the love between two of the nicest and most talented human beings in Hollywood.

Lieutenant C. J. Holt (formerly known to his friends as "Tim") is again maritally free lance. (Continued on page 62)

After being squired to Macambo and other plush spots by Erral several weeks running, studios dangled screen test before Nara Eddington's nose. Errol, whose latest interest is art collecting, is being named in same breath with Daris Duke Cramwell.

SHE'S ENGAGED! SHE'S LOVELY!

ADORABLY PRETTY, Hilda Holder is another charming Pond's engaged girl, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. S. C. Holder of one of North Carolina's first families . . .

"Dick enlisted two months before Pearl Harbor—I wanted to be doing something necessary, too," Hilda says, "so I found my job helping to build planes.

"I get up at 4:00 A.M., and don't get back home until 4:00 P.M. It seemed outlandish at first, but now I like it. I do have to watch out for my complexion, though.

"I give my face a good Pond's creaming after work every day so I'm certain-sure there's no greasy dirt clogging up my pores. Lots of the girls keep a big jar of Pond's at the plant. I guess they love it the way I do."

Hilda beauty cleans her face with Pond's like this: She smooths Pond's Cold Cream over her face and throat and pats briskly to soften and release dirt and make-up. Tissues off. She "rinses" with more Pond's, swirling her white-coated fingers around in little spirals. Tissues off again. Her face feels "perfectly lovely" she says, "so extra clean, so nice to touch."

Yes—it's no accident engaged girls like Hilda, exquisite society leaders like Gloria Vanderbilt De Cicco, and Britain's Lady Grenfell delight in this soft-smooth cream. Ask for a big, luxurious jar of Pond's Cold Cream today. Use it every night, every morning—for daytime clean-ups, too!

HILDA'S EXQUISITE COMPLEXION has that appealing baby-clear look every girl wants. "Pond's Cold Cream is the only beauty care I use," she says. "I keep a big jar in my locker at the plant—and a big jar at home."

ASK FOR A LUXURIOUS BIG JAR! It's more patriotic to buy large sizes, saves glass and manpower. (You may see different color "war caps" on Pond's jars now—but Pond's Cold Cream is the same lovely quality!)

SHE USES POND'S!

TODAY—MANY MORE WOMEN USE POND'S THAN ANY OTHER FACE CREAM AT ANY PRICE

Anne Baxter, just turned 20, had date to meet Richard Derr in Mexico City Xmas Day but denied engagement to him before that and started doing rounds with Bill Eythe, bearded for role in "Eve of St. Mark."

Betty Hutton, last day on Tucson location, lost $1200 diamond in bath. When hotel guest complained of gurgling drain, management found ring, phoned Betty who hadn't missed it. (Here with Arturo de Cordova.)

Alice was as breathless and jittery through Phil Harris's opening at new Slapsy Maxie's as if it were his first try-out. Reviews next A. M. raved. Alice is shopping again in toddlers' depts. Young'un due April.

GOOD NEWS Continued

Some time ago he and Mrs. Holt reconciled, went to Victorville to live (at which point Lt. Holt was stationed), then decided that their second guess was still wrong.

Tim is now stationed at El Centro, California, in the capacity of an instructor of aerial bombardment.

Trip Quips:

Doris Harris, Betty Hutton's pretty hairdresser, was crossing a Paramount street when she was hailed by Bob Hope. "When I was in Sicily," Bob explained, "I was buttonholed by a handsome, red-headed sailor named Freddie. He asked me if I knew you and I said sure. So he told me to tell you hello."

This minor incident, repeated in kind a thousand times out of his seemingly bottomless memory, indicates one excellent reason why Bob Hope—back from his battlefield journey—is probably the most popular man on earth today.

It happened while Ray Milland was in New York, staying in a Tower apartment of a very famous hotel. One morning he was having late coffee and early conversation with a friend. He was attired solely in the trousers of his pajamas. His hair hadn't been combed, he wasn't shaved, and he was sitting in a relaxed attitude on the final inch of his spine, long legs extended comfortably to rest on the back of a chair.

When someone knocked, he assumed that a member of his family or a friend who had a suite on the same floor was joining him for coffee. "Come in," he called.

In trooped about 15 wide-eyed fans, complete with autograph books and worshipful expressions, only to find the most astounded celebrity ever to blush scarlet and offer an apology. Your reporter would like to tell you how the fans managed to gain entrance to the carefully guarded suite of Mr. Milland, but that would be suicidal. I have to go on living in Hollywood.

If you saw "Behind the Rising Sun," you became acquainted all over again with Margo, one of the most fabulous and exciting personalities in or out of Hollywood.

Recently she was sent by RKO on a combination personal appearance and bond-selling trip. At one theater she was booked to deliver a stirring bond-rally speech just after the riotous musical act of a South American orchestra. This band was composed of very small men, all about five feet high. They wore enormous, multi-colored hats, gaucho suits with serapes, and they played quaint instruments varying from a knee-high marimba to native stringed instruments. Margo towered above them like a redwood in a mushroom garden.

She watched rehearsal, then said to the manager, "You can't ask me to follow them on the program. After all that color and harmony, I would be a frightful flop."

"You'll have to explain it to the band," the manager said with a shrug. "They speak only Spanish."

Margo is very deft with her usteds, so she explained that it was best for her to make a little talk just before the musical act. They wanted to know when they should make their entrance. "When everyone claps"—and she showed them the hand signal for applause—"then you come out and play."

She had forgotten that, during her speech, there were several telling phrases dealing with the war effort and Americanism, which would appeal to her listeners. The first time the audience broke into applause, Margo heard the patter of little feet and the scraping of little instruments.

In horrified Spanish she tried to tell them, "Not yet; not yet." It was no use. When the clapping occurred, they had been told to play. And play they did.

A tall captain, wearing the insignia of the Adjutant General's Department, rushed out to meet the plane on which the Jack Benny troupe had just arrived in Persia. He was Captain Gordon Jones, a contract player for RKO before he went into the Army.

While he was exchanging rapid-fire conversation with Jack Benny, Captain Jones was handed a letter that had just arrived by air from Hollywood. It had been written by Jerry Asher of Warner Brothers, a close (Continued on page 64)

In her forthcoming Paramount picture "Lady in The Dark" Ginger Rogers and the entire cast wear blue make-up for one of the dream sequences. Miss Rogers has threatened to don that color and wear it indefinitely on account of her marine, Jack Briggs, has gone overseas.

Notable Quotables:

Someone asked Bob Hope when he was scheduled to start work on his new picture, "The Road to Utopia."

"Not until the 14th," he said.

The rather surprised answer came back, "But I talked to Bing and he said he was starting on the 1st."

Bob nodded sagely. "I always give Bing two weeks' start on the scenes," he explained. "Then I fade him in the stretch."

The Young Idea:

Miss Pia, daughter of Ingrid Bergman, was a set visitor one day when a camera crane shot was being made. She was allowed to ride with the cameraman on the thrilling trip from first floor shot, to second story shot and back again.

After she told her mother that she knew what she wanted for Christmas: a camera crane that she could ride all day. "But darling," Suitor Oscar Brooks hot-footed up from Mexico to counter Steve Hannagan's advances, but Ann Sheridon was cool. Annie's gown, covered with 35,000 stones for "Shine on Harvest Moon" cost $3000.

Bob Hope howls loudest at Canteen, spends off moments in own dressing room phoning families of G.I.'s he met overseas. He's aching to head for Pacific camp tour.

laughed her mother, "they cost FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS."

Several days later, Pia's nurse took her downtown to confer with a certain department store Santa Claus. When he asked Pia what she wanted to find beside her Christmas tree, she fixed him with a positive eye. "I want a camera crane," she announced with resolution, "even if it is going to cost you five thousand dollars."

Jim Brown and his wife have, in the past, frequently congratulated themselves upon their great good luck in keeping a nurse for their child. This Olympian being was everything desirable: gentle, soft-voiced, firm when necessary, and devoted. As she was 67, she didn't ask for unexpected days off—she was happy with her Sunday and Thursday. And she seemed so permanent . . . a priceless attribute in these days of wholesale conversion to Lockheed.

The other morning she gave notice. She explained, with pink cheeks, that she was resigning to become a bride.

The pretty, cultured woman said to the salesgirl in the layette department of a large department store, "Please send two of each of the items I have ordered to my home address."

The salesgirl blinked, but wrote up the order. Her customer was Mrs. Will Price, cinematically known as Maureen O'Hara, and she is making plans for a spring addition to the family. Because twins are a regular occurrence in both the Price and O'Hara families, she is shopping on the double.

Man's Castle:

For months, Mr. and Mrs. Sonny Tufts lived in a camp cottage. Finally, however, they found a large and comfortable house in one of the canyons about halfway between the studio and the valley—a defense plant area.

Knowing, at first-hand, of the housing shortage, the Tufts decided to make patriotic use of their two spare bedrooms with connecting bath, by taking two roomers.

There was only one difficulty: One of the paying guests was a supervisor at Lockheed so it was essential for him to have a telephone. Mr. Tufts explained his dilemma: He was working a non-essential industry, so the telephone company couldn't supply him with an Ameche.

The supervisor fixed that, so now Mr. Tufts uses his roomer's telephone when it is imperative for him to get in touch with the studio.

When Dana Andrews moved out to the valley, he was given a cow, name of Sophie, by the real estate agent who consummated the Andrews deal. Dana was gratified by such kindness, but a little depressed at thought of the work entailed by ownership of the animal. Discreet inquiry around the neighborhood, with a view to sharing or giving away the bovine, informed Mr. Andrews that Sophie had belonged in turn to everyone in the tract. He happened to be the final purchaser of property there, so it looked as if he were stuck. Six o'clock milking night and morning! The groaning arose to high heaven over the trouble caused by milk, cream and eventually butter.

But that was months ago. They do say that a glow of well-being now exudes from the Andrews home, and that envious neighbors keep chiding themselves with the acid fact that they, too, once owned Sophie.

Jack Carson and Kay St. Germain finally bought and moved into their new home, taking along the furniture from their old house.

Because the new house is much larger than the old, the Carsons began to search for furniture to fill in the lonesome corners—without much luck. Everyone in Los Angeles was furniture-hunting, too.

Hollywood's pet tricks for winter beauty!

Jinx applies face lotion on cotton pad.

She outlines lips with a brush.

Zing . . . and the New Year came in with a crash! After the celebration, while you're combing the confetti out of your hair, give a thought to this fact: Good grooming rules apply year in, year out, sunshine or snow flakes. Only the attack is a little different with each season. Thing to do is plan your beauty campaign as MacArthur plans his expeditions. Lay down the rules, plot your course and move forward. If chapped skin problems assail you, do a little maneuvering with creams and lotions. If a red nose annoys you, camouflage with wintertime make-up. Don't let enemy bugaboos, "frost and wintry blasts," reduce your personal charm. Follow these blueprints for good grooming that Jinx Falkenburg models so fetchingly.

plan a—The Bath

No need to convince you that a bath a day is a P.G. essential (personal grooming to you). And before you put your liddle toe in, sprinkle some sweet smelling bath salts into the water. Don't forget to bring your scrub brush and favorite toilet soap with you. Lather up some extra special soap fluff and give yourself a workout from tip to toe. When you're clean as clean, step out and give yourself a brisk drying with the towel . . . invigorating, huh?

Want to smell pretty and sweet? Then toilet water. The aroma will last the clock around, keep you dainty and fresh. Smooth a skin lotion over your freshly bathed self. And for a glamour finish to your bath routine, try a dusting of body powder or talcum.

plan b—Be Fastidious

A word to the wise is sufficient, so haul out your deodorant or anti-perspirant. Use daily, if necessary. There are cream, liquid or powder forms; the choice is up to you. Point is, don't wait to use a deodorant until underarm perspiration spoils your best wool dress. We go along with the ads and assure you that anti-perspirants are also grand insurance against losing your friends and your job.

'Course you'll want your pretty pins to look sleek and neat, so defuzz your legs at least once a week. There are depilatories and handy abrasive gadgets that will do a smooth job for you. Take care, too, that your ten toes are in condition, because open-toed sandals have a way of showing you up. A weekly pedicure should do the trick.

Next, my pretty damsels, give a thought to your dainty paws. See that they're smooth and in condition. Whatever your job, kitchen, factory or office, your hands are bound to take a beating in winter weather. Follow every washing with an application of hand lotion. It's a nifty thought to carry a small bottle of the stuff in your purse. Or keep some in your locker or office drawer for use during the day. Your hands will thank you no end!

HOW'S YOUR BEAUTY RATING?

SPARKLE and glow, my chickadees, if you'd be the belle of 1944. Though your features be plain and your moniker "Jane," you can still dazzle the lads on furlough if you make the most of what you have. That involves a few beauty fixin' tricks that can easily be slipped into your daily itinerary. For, my friends, as you sow, so shall you reap. As you tend to good grooming, so shall charm be your reward. With these words of beauty wisdom, comes a personal grooming questionnaire. We know the answers, but do you? Fill in the missing words and check on your batting average in the glamour field. If you rate 100% (the answers are on page 102), that's a home run, and you're good. If you have 15 runs and 5 errors, you're still pretty good. Any score below that, however, means the "bench" for you, sis. Come on, let's go!

HOW MANY SHOES MAKE A VICTORY?

HOW far would you expect our soldiers to advance—on the bitter, rocky hills of Italy, for instance—with the soles out of their shoes? How much would you expect from an army in rags?

Forgetting for a moment the tanks, planes, bullets and bayonets we must send to our men, think of just this one item: SHOES. The millions of pairs of shoes our men must have over and over again. In taking Attu we read that jackets, gloves, boots, sleeping bags—"brand new Tuesday, were worn out and discarded by Saturday." That's what war does. Those are just some of the minor things that victories cost.

They're fighting now—in winter. If there were something you could do to make sure that that boy you know would get all the shoes, warm coats, the equipment he needs to safeguard his life—wouldn't you do it?

Somehow, because it's not direct, it's hard to realize, perhaps, that buying a War Bond right here in your home town, is going to do so much.

But think of the people in the next block, the next town, the next state—all buying a War Bond, too. Think of the money from those Bonds flowing into the Army, the Navy, the Air Corps, the Marines—of the power that money will give our boys . . . YOUR BOY!

Your bit may seem a little bit. But it's the mighty drop in the bucket that's keeping our armies advancing—well-shod, well-fed, well cared-for. Buy that War Bond now! When victory is ours . . . when you get that letter saying "I'm on my way home!" you'll realize how much that War Bond did.

And—it's your investment in the future—earning interest. For you. And your boy.

FACTS ABOUT WAR BONDS

1. War Bonds cost $18.75 for which you receive $25 in 10 years—or $4 for every $3.
2. War Bonds are the world's safest investment—guaranteed by the United States Government.
3. War Bonds can be made out in 1 name or 2, as co-owners.
4. War Bonds cannot go down in value. If they are lost, the Government will issue new ones.
5. War Bonds can be cashed in, in case of necessity, after 60 days.
6. War Bonds begin to accrue interest after one year.

THE REAGAN BOYS

Republican and Dutch is a Democrat, and Neil's a Catholic, and Ronnie's a Protestant, and Ronnie is still ambitious and serious minded, while Neil is happy-go-lucky. So they still tangle, as they always have, in some perfectly lovely scraps—over practically anything.

One Christmas in Hollywood a while back before Moon and Dutch's dad, Jack Reagan, died, he resurrected an old toy boat Ronnie had treasured as a kid. He took it over to the studio prop department and had it all fixed up and painted. Christmas Day he handed it to Ronnie. Moon was there, of course, so he strolled with Ronnie out to the swimming pool to sail the boat. Ronnie was thrilled as pie with the toy, so wickedly Moon said,

"You know, Dutch, that boat's really mine. I got it for Christmas when we were kids. Hand it over."

"Why, you—!" sputtered Ronnie. "You know darn well it always was my favorite boat. Beat it!" So Moon grabbed the boat, and they tugged on it like a couple of school kids, scuffling around the pool until finally Ronnie pushed Moon in, clothes and all!

It's been that way with the Reagan boys since they can remember, according to Moon, whom I cornered in Hollywood the other day. Moon Reagan is one of those swell pink-faced Irish guys who loves to tell a funny story, especially if it's on himself. It's a shame he isn't a movie star, because he'd keep you in stitches. Moon said he gained his first respect for his Brother Ronnie when he socked him on the head with a hatchet.

That was back in Tampico, Illinois, where the Reagan boys were born. Moon was about six years old, and Ronnie was three. Moon was chopping some sticks, and he asked Ronnie to hold them. When he didn't hold them like Moon told him to, Moon bopped his baby brother on the bean, parting his hair with the hatchet.

"You know," grinned Moon, "that little monkey never even cried! He just walked in the house leaking blood like an old fountain pen—until Mom saw him!"

"Then what?" I asked.

Moon winced. "I don't like to discuss that," he grinned.

Moon Reagan admits he was a problem child, and it's a wonder that under his influence his brother Dutch ever amounted to anything at all. Moon was three years older than Ronnie, and he felt it his juvenile duty to initiate him into the mischievous mysteries of life. Ronnie, by the way, got his nickname, Dutch, because he was roly-poly from the minute he was born. His Irish dad took one look at him and said, "Gosh—he looks like a Dutchman!" To make Ronnie see red today, Moon has only to roll out his full name in a mocking tone, "Ronald Wilson Reagan."

twin terrors . . .

Moon got his monicker a little later on when he fell asleep in the barber chair one day and woke up with his head shaved. It grew out spiky and high and round, and he parted it in the middle, like the comic strip bum, Moon Mullins. So he was "Moon" from then on, and he admits the name has fitted him in more ways than one. Moon has never admired work when stacked up against fun and adventure. He proved that early in life and tried seriously to influence Brother Dutch.

The Reagans lived across a little park from the railroad depot in Tampico. Papa and grocery store down the way. And Mama Nellie Reagan got her early gray hairs trying to fish Moon and Dutch out from playing under the freight cars. Jack Reagan made the mistake once of trying to turn this lure of the rails into a day's work for the kids. He had a shipment of potatoes in, so he entrusted Moon and Dutch, aged eight and five, to crawl inside the car and sort out the bad potatoes from the good ones. Before he knew it, Jack Reagan was fending off angry citizens streaming into his store dripping potato mould. They said his brats were barricaded behind the freight car doors heaving rotten potatoes at all passers-by.

Moon and Dutch Reagan were still small moppets when their dad took a job with Montgomery Ward, and they moved to Chicago. The Big City's adventurous temptations got Moon and his baby brother in trouble at once. First thing they did was run away from their South Side home to the nearest train tracks, the New York Central line, down around Blue Island. They hopped a beer truck on the way home, and Moon fell off and tore his leg. After that they were forbidden to leave the house. But one day Mom Reagan had to go somewhere so she locked Moon and Dutch inside.

When Mrs. Reagan came home, the house was surrounded by excited neighbors and a squad of cops. The place was reeking gas and about to explode. They broke the door down, and she rushed in terrified, expecting to find Moon and Baby Dutch stretched out cold by gas fumes. What she saw was a telltale chair and a stack of books by the door and an open transom. The kids had blown out the gas light in the hall to cover their escape and set out to see the city. The cops and neighbors finally located them, blocks away, down around Sixty-third and Cottage Grove. A tipsy gentleman had them in tow, and he was on the point of leading them into a saloon. Mrs. Reagan snatched them up right outside the swinging door—the whipping that followed is another black moment in Moon's memory.

Ronnie Reagan and Moon call Dixon, Illinois, their home town. Their dad had a prosperous store there, and that's where they grew up and went to high school. Everybody in Dixon knew the Reagan brothers. They were the kind of kids who got around. They lived in a big house on a bluff overlooking the North Side High School athletic field, and long before they hit high school themselves, the coach had tagged both Moon and Dutch for the football teams. When they were ready for high, Moon and Dutch split up for the first time in their lives.

Rock River runs through Dixon, dividing the town sharply in two. North of the river was "North Side," the fancy part of town. "South Side" was across the tracks—or across the river. Moon and Dutch lived on the North Side, but Moon's amiable roughneck leanings made him tag North Side H. S. as a sissy school, where the fellows actually wore coats and ties. He wanted no part of such foppy stuff, so he went to South Side, in cords and old leather jackets. There was a wild gang at South Side. The school was deliberately flooded with the fire hose a couple of times, the windows smashed, melted lead poured in keyholes, the teachers chased out of their classes, and the library scattered around almost daily. Finally the school board installed a tough guy wrecker to break up Moon's gang, and he eventually graduated in advance of Dutch, who had picked North Side H. S. because of a girl.

The girl was a certain preacher's daughter, and Ronnie Reagan had a heavy case on her all through high school and even into college. She was brown haired with freckles, a home-type beauty, and she crossed him up in the end and married an Englishman. But it was wonderful while it lasted.

Love trouble didn't keep Dutch Reagan from becoming one of Dixon's athletic heroes though. Both he and Moon burned 'em up at football. Dutch played tackle, and Moon played end. The two high schools, North and South, pooled their football material, and the Reagan brothers made the co-op team easily. Ronnie also starred at track and swimming, while Moon starred at basketball.

Ironically enough, although Moon was the town Hell-Raiser and the Bad Influence, it was Dutch who first landed in jail. That was one Fourth-of-July night. Fireworks had been banned by the local gestapo in Dixon, but Ronnie had a bunch, and when Moon egged him on, he walked clear to the edge of town and popped them off a bridge. He thought he was safe that far out, but the Law rolled up, and they hauled him down to the pokey. Paw Reagan refused to pay the fine—$5 and costs—so Dutch had to sleep all night in the cooler.

Slip-ups like that on Ronnie's part, however, were rare. Moon admits Dutch Reagan took himself seriously under the tender influence of a preacher's daughter's love. Ronnie always had been a little on the religious side. Both Moon and Dutch went to Protestant Sunday school as kids. Jack Reagan was a Catholic and Nellie a Protestant. When the boys grew up, they were given their choice and split up religiously. But as kids, Ronnie and Moon both attended the Protestant Sunday school every Sabbath, all slicked out in stovepipe pants and the cutest bangs and Buster Brown collars. Then they'd go on to church.

There were one or two co-operative activities outside of athletics that Moon and the Dutch Reagan saw eye to eye about in those school days. One was music and the other, pocket money. Both Dutch and Moon belonged to the town band that paraded here and there on gala events. Moon booped out a doubtful bass on a B-flat tuba, and Ronnie got to be a pretty fancy drum major before they turned that activity over to girls with pretty legs.

Dutch was always thrifty, even as a kid, about making a dollar and saving it, Moon remembers. Dutch was a swell swimmer, so summers he always got the lifeguard job at the public swimming pool in Dixon, and he augmented this steady income by buying himself some canoes and renting them for 50c an hour at a resort up Rock River.

One fall, Dutch's rent-out canoes stayed up the river later than usual, and it turned cold suddenly. In fact, it snowed, and Dutch knew unless he got the canoes back down that night, they'd probably freeze in the river, and he'd lose all his capital. So he routed Moon out of bed, and they set out after them. It was a dangerous six-mile downstream paddle in the dark, and Moon capsized with a heavy mackinaw and boots on, and pretty nearly drowned. After that he wondered if Dutch loved him as much as he did his canoes. Of course, he knew better.

Oddly enough, Dutch got to college before Moon did although Moon was two years ahead of him in high school. Moon laid out a while after he finally was eased out of South Side High (to the great relief of both the school board and his father, who was wearing out the carpet in the principal's office trying to get him back in school). Moon worked in his dad's store and took it easy, playing semi-pro baseball. He's not so sure Dutch would have gone on to college either, except that the preacher (his girl's father) was of the church denomination which ran Eureka College. She went on there, and as love was still in bloom, he did, too.

After the first semester he came back and told Moon he had to come up, too. He said he had "arranged everything" and that Moon was a cinch to make the football team and lead the life of Riley. It didn't turn out as easy as that. Both Moon and Dutch hashed and waited tables at sorority houses and their own fraternit house, Tau Kappa Epsilon, to earn thei keep. And Ronnie doubled up later on a janitor at the gym. But they had plent of time out for fun with the co-ed (Dutch was still true-blue to his true love, but Moon certainly wasn't) and, o course, athletics.

Ronnie already had regular tackle o the Varsity at Eureka all sewed up b the time Moon arrived. Moon played substitute end at first while the coac looked him over. That burnt him up som but Dutch even more. He kept telling th coach what a whiz his brother Moon wa

One day, when the team went to Carthage College for the Big Game, Ronnie went as usual as regular tackle while Moon warmed the bench practically all of the game. As he recalls it, the bench could stand some warming, too, as it turned bitter cold, and the ground was frozen like cement. Well, the Carthage boys had Eureka on the grease to the tune of 6-0 with only three minutes to play, and the coach began to get desperate. Moon saw him looking up and down the bench, and by that time he didn't care at all about playing football, being almost frozen stiff. But the coach jerked Ronnie and sent in Moon at end, and with about a minute to play, the Eureka quarterback called a dipsy-doo double cross spot pass play. Moon wasn't supposed to get the ball at all, but it bounded out of somebody's frozen fingers, lit in his, and he ran for a touchdown. Then the game ended, 7-6. Even out on the field Moon could hear Dutch yelling, "That's my brother. That's my BROTHER!" And today when Moon wants to kid Ronnie, he cracks, "That's my brother!"

The Reagan boys stayed aces around Eureka College from then on until they graduated. There were a few problems Moon can remember, and most of what Moon remembers about his college days is on the screwball side. For instance, he had a turn of teaching freshman economics and sociology, and even though he was a year behind Dutch, he wound up with Dutch as his pupil in a freshman class! Ronnie had dipped back into a freshman course to pick up some easy credits or something. Anyway, Moon remembers that it was very embarrassing for him, especially since Dutch absolutely refused to open a book all year.

Dutch wasn't much of a student. Moon, although he was on the lookout for mischief, had a deep interest in books and studies which he still has today. Ronnie is more on the extrovert side. But Ronnie's complete obsession with sports of all kinds kept him away from any collegiate vices. He took his track and football training seriously. He was a typical do-or-die college hero, making touchdowns and winning races for his lady fair.

Dutch never took a drink until his last year in college, and he never smoked then either, not counting the kid times back of the shed when Moon would get him sick with some stolen weeds. When Dutch finally took a taste of alcohol for the first time, the results were spectacular.

more than mellow . . .

A couple of fraternity brothers at the TKE house had lugged home a jug of wine right before the Christmas holidays, and one below-zero night they sat it out before the fireplace and started to make merry. Ronnie came in about then and decided, since it was Christmas, he might as well take a taste. But, unwise to the kick in any beverage other than his accustomed milk, he gurgled half the jug right down. In a few minutes his eyes bugged out of his head, he let out a whoop, yanked open the door and tore down the road, without a coat or anything. Being a good 440-man, Dutch Reagan really ambled through the freezing night, with Moon and his terrified fraternity brothers 'way back in the ruck.

They never did catch him. But after he ran a mile and a half at top speed, they found Dutch sitting in a snowbank with a glazed look in his eyes, unable to speak. So they carted him back to the house, slapped him right into bed, and luckily he didn't get pneumonia.

It was also in his last year at Eureka College that Dutch Reagan showed signs of turning into a radio announcer. He'd sit before the radio at the TKE house every spare minute and mock the announcer. For fun, he'd stage fake broadcasts of imaginary events. He sounded pretty good, too. Dutch Reagan was sport happy anyway, and Moon thinks what probably made him so nutty about turning broadcaster was that he could perch free on sidelines of big college games.

Moon thoroughly approved of the idea himself. In those days, despite the fact that Dutch was a year ahead of Moon at college, he was still looking to his older bud for advice. The opposition to Dutch's big idea didn't come from Moon.

It came from home. Jack Reagan, Ronnie's dad, had already landed him a job as manager of the sporting goods department in the local Montgomery-Ward store. It was a nice break for a young kid just out of college, and Dutch's athletic knowledge would fit in handy. But he couldn't see it, not after the exciting visions that whizzed around in his brain about broadcasting big football games. So he hitch-hiked the 120 miles back to Dixon and told his Dad so. Jack Reagan was pretty sore. He said that's what all this silly football business did to kids. They didn't want to work.

So Dutch was pretty low after hitch-hiking back to Eureka. Moon bucked him up. He told Dutch the thing to do was get a job and show his old man. The place for that was Chicago where all the big radio companies had headquarters. "Go on up there," said Moon, "and hit 'em for a job. Tell 'em you're good. Tell 'em," he grinned, "I said so!"

So Ronnie sneaked away from school and made the rounds of the Chicago radio offices hunting an audition. He didn't get one, not a smell of a job, but he heard of a one-time spot, the Iowa-Minnesota game, that was open out of Davenport, Iowa. He travelled on up there, and they tried him out and told him "maybe"—to go home and wait for a call. Ronnie went back to Dixon and sat around while his dad, plenty sore, stewed and called him crazy to turn down a solid store job for a nutty chance at a radio broadcast. But finally the call to come to Davenport arrived—and also a Midwest blizzard. Trains stopped running, and Dutch couldn't get there. He almost went wild. He was in the doghouse all around—with everyone but Brother Moon.

Luckily, the blizzard melted in a couple of days, and Ronnie got his chance at the game, and then an announcer's job on station WOC in Davenport. He made good and stayed on the staff. It was the first time Moon and Dutch Reagan had ever been permanently separated. Moon didn't like that any more than Dutch did, so after he graduated and helped his dad a while in the store, he took a trip up to see Ronnie, who was then in Des Moines. Moon had no idea of turning radio man himself, but the Reagan brothers missed each other more than either let on, and Ronnie had a pretty good job now in Des Moines with a big station. He told Moon an oil company wanted him to broadcast a Saturday night sports review after the football games, but he was so busy he couldn't handle it.

"Why don't you do it, Moon?" Dutch suggested.

"Are you nuts?" chuckled Moon. Dutch said he wasn't. So, completely cold, but with all the Reagan nerve in the world, Moon tried out and got the job. He made $17 a week, not enough even to afford a room, but he moved in with Dutch, and the Reagan boys were back together again. Pretty soon they got to teaming up on football broadcasts and dishing out the thrills so much like one another that listeners couldn't tell the difference.

Dutch and Moon didn't split up again until Hollywood grabbed Ronald. That was when Dutch traveled West to Catalina Island with the Chicago Cubs for spring training. Moon stayed in Iowa, and he'll never forget a letter he got from Dutch telling all the wonders of Southern California, from bathing beauties to glass-bottom boats, orange groves and Spanish castles. Dutch didn't mention Hollywood until 'way down at the bottom. "How would you like a movie star for a brother—hey? I got introduced to a Hollywood big shot the other day, and he says he'll give me a screen test. Want my autograph?"

dutch gable . . .

Moon sent a postcard back. He said, "Keep the autograph, Mister Gable. See you in Iowa."

That's where he did see Dutch again, too. Ronnie came back on the job. He'd made a test at Warner Brothers and met a few big shots around the lot after an actress he'd met at Catalina, Joy Hodges, took him to the studio. But he never took any of it seriously. He was twice as excited about a new sponsored sports broadcast on a national hookup that was due to start that fall.

So when Moon got a telephone call one day from Des Moines and heard Dutch say, "Listen—can you beat this? Guess what happened. I got a movie contract in the mail today!" he almost fell over. Then Moon almost blew up when Dutch went on. "What do you think I ought to do about it—send it back?"

"Hold everything!" yelped Moon. "I'll be right up."

He drove over to Des Moines a mile a minute that morning and laid down the law to Brother Dutch, who wasn't sure he wanted to risk losing the sports program for a wild crack at Hollywood. "You sign that contract," said Moon, "or I'll poke you one. It's the chance of a lifetime. If you don't take it, you're even dumber than I thought you were." It almost ended up in a scrap, but finally Dutch signed and—well—almost everybody knows the rest. He got a lead right off in "Love Is on the Air" and much to his own surprise, Dutch Reagan found himself an actor and pretty soon a star.

But the glamour of Hollywood hasn't made a speck of difference with the Reagan boys. Not from the moment Ronald Reagan began slicking up to right now. Moon stayed in Iowa and spent one vacation in California with Dutch, but he spent all his time on the beach at Santa Monica and never even looked at a studio. Next time he saw Ronnie was in Chicago at a Chicago theater. Ronnie was on a personal appearance tour, and along with him was a cute blond actress from his own studio. Dutch introduced Moon to Jane Wyman. Later, he called Moon into his dressing room.

"We're going to get married," said Dutch. "What do you think about that?"

"And for the first time in my life," Moon laughed, "I never had any advice to offer Dutch." Moon had married a Des Moines girl, and he knew already that marriage is a private affair.

Three years after Dutch Reagan came to Hollywood, his father and mother came out to California to live, and it wasn't long until Moon, too, found a radio connection in the booming broadcasting studios of Hollywood. Now he's program director for the Warner Broadcasting Corporation. A couple of years ago Jack Reagan died, but Mrs. Reagan has a place near her boys, and Moon and Dutch live right on the same street. So the Reagans are together all the time now.

Moon hasn't any kids, but he's the favorite "Uncle Moon" to Ronnie's and Jane's darling, Maureen Elizabeth. He calls her "Whitey" because of her cotton curls, and Jane calls Moon "The Bad Influence" because he spoils Maureen.

When Moon and Dutch aren't changing the political set-up of the world or something at Ronnie's house, they're usually working in each other's yards. A while back Moon and Dutch decided Ronnie's swimming pool needed a beach. So they hewed out a 17 x 18 foot place, a couple of feet deep, and put one in. The excavation pit turned out to be almost solid rock, and the 12 tons of sand got dumped by mistake on the driveway, yards away, so Moon's back was about broke from shovels and wheelbarrows. When he heard Ronnie tell some friends of his that he—Ronnie—had done the job all by himself, Moon felt tempted to bean him again with a hatchet!

But the Reagan boys are saving their Sunday punches these days for a bigger target—the war. Ronald, of course, is already a captain. Ronnie—a swell horseman—had a reserve cavalry commission he earned when back at Des Moines, and joined up right away. Moon went with him to Fort MacArthur and March Field cals, because for a while it looked like the Army wouldn't accept Ronnie. His eyes aren't up to snuff. But he got a limited service job out of it and is now personnel officer of the big training-film center at Roach studios.

Moon was a National Guardsman himself, back in Iowa, and he's been trying to get in a uniform ever since the war began. But a missing ear drum blocks him there. So when he sees Dutch in his Army uniform, he gets a little green with envy.

But Ronnie's success as a Hollywood star hasn't given Moon one pang of jealousy. He plays around in a few pictures himself every now and then, in addition to his radio job. But he wouldn't be a star if you gave him the town and all the gold in it. Moon's ambition is to live on the desert in a cabin and take life easy.

The other night Moon and his wife and Ronnie and Jane went on a rare Saturday night excursion to the bright lights. They arrived at a war crowded restaurant where lines of hungry people waited. A mob of them swamped Ronnie for his autograph, and when the crush was all over the food was gone, and the restaurant folded up.

"That's my brother!" Moon cracked. Dutch flared. "Listen, if I wasn't wearing a uniform, I'd sock you one!"

"You and who else?" said Moon. And the girls had to stop it there. The Reagan boys will probably never change—which dull and dismal as a rice pudding. These skin saboteurs take the form of chapped skin, parched lips and sometimes a red nose. You can shun their presence by treating your skin to lots of cream.

If you're a normal skinned femme (aren't you the lucky one!), practice the soap and water routine at least once a day. Work up some super duper lather, scrub your face and neck energetically. You should treat your face to some soothing cream. Use firm, upward strokes and remove the cream with cleansing tissues. To tone your skin, saturate a tissue with astringent or tonic and pat on.

If it's dry skin you bemoan, use lots of rich emollient cream. Use a soap made on an extra oily base. The better to soften your skin, my dear. Cream make-up bases are excellent, too.

You oily-skinned femmes should make a New Year's resolution to scrub your face with soapy suds at least twice a day. Get into the habit of dabbing on an astringent. Another way to keep your complexion a-blooming is to carry handy cleansing pads in your knapsack for use during the day. Then take note of the liquid and cake forms of foundation base. Ideal for oily skin!

plan d—Your Coif

Just when you least expect him, your furloughing beau comes into town, and there you are with stringy, bewildered looking hair. If this nightmare hasn't happened to you so far, make sure it never does. Keep your locks spanking clean with frequent shampoos. There's a specially wonderful one with hair-conditioner added that will bring a dash of sparkle and gleam to your old mop. Make with the brush at least one hundred strokes every night. If your halo is in need of one, start the new year with a new permanent. Try one of the home kit permanents that give glossy, bright curls in record time. Two more good reasons? These home permanents are safe and economical.

Tuck bows in your top knot for an added bit of glamour. You can secure 'em with the tiny tuck combs that have split teeth and that come in varied shades.

plan e—Care for Clothes

If a pin is sticking you, serves you right. Clothes should have buttons, not safety pins, to ensure their staying on. If you're guilty, then settle down tonight with a sewing box. While you're about it, take inventory of your drawers. In order? Are your things neatly arranged? A last minute dinner date shouldn't find you exhausted from searching for a clean slip to wear.

Success Plan

"Oh, what a beautiful morning!" hum you as so gaily you step out into the brisk, fresh air. And, of course, the morning's beautiful the same as you are . . . with a good grooming campaign to back you up!

Julia Jean got to loathe the sight of orange sherbet.

Lying in her bed by the window, she saw two horses grazing in a nearby field—and the plan leaped fullblown to life. All day she lay there, suddenly so serene that the nurses eyed her suspiciously. She smiled back—a cherub. All day she watched the horses and decided she'd take the chestnut, because he was smaller and such a lovely color.

It might have worked, too, if one of the kids hadn't buzzed. She'd waited till she was sure they were all asleep, but this tattletale wasn't. No sooner had she kicked the screen out and jumped to the ground, than the hue and cry started. But before they caught her, she'd given them a run for their money. "I want to go to my mother," she screamed. "I want to get on that little red horse and go to my mother."

black clouds . . .

She was put back to bed, the window locked, and a nurse set to watch her. "Go to sleep," said the nurse. "You'll feel much better in the morning."

Big mournful eyes gazed up at her. "Who told on me?" demanded Julia Jean darkly. "I have to know, because she's my enemy for life."

Came the lovely day when they bathed her in some kind of horrible solution and took her to the office, and she went tearing between tears and laughter into Mother's arms. Mother'd brought her a whole new outfit—white dotted Swiss dress, white shoes, a blue bow for her hair. "But you've got to eat this first." It was orange sherbet!

Later, it seemed as if those three weeks in the hospital had been a kind of preparation for worse to come. One afternoon her godmother called for her at school. "Your Mother had to go up to 'Frisco honey. On—on business. You're coming home with me."

"To 'Frisco? Without saying good-by?"

"She couldn't help it, Julia Jean. There just wasn't time."

Next day godmother said: "We're going to San Francisco."

"But why doesn't Mother come here? Is she sick?"

"No, she's all right. She just wants you up there with her."

A slow suspicion formed in Julia Jean's mind and strengthened to certainty. Mother was going to have a baby, that was it. There was always something mysterious about having a baby, and the mothers always went away first. Her eyes lit up. What fun to have a cute little baby to play with! She turned to her godmother. No, better not ask. It was true; she knew it.

There was no sign of a baby at the hotel where they met Mother. Julia Jean swallowed her disappointment. Maybe he wasn't ready yet, maybe he'd come tomorrow. She didn't like to ask Mother who looked kind of white and tired.

"You'll have to tell her," said Mildred Turner abruptly. "I can't"—and left.

Frightened, Julia Jean started after her, but godmother drew her back. "Honey, I've got something hard to tell you. Your daddy's gone."

"Gone?"

"There was an accident, and he was hurt—and died."

Died. There was a girl at school whose father died. She'd always been so sorry for that girl. It seemed such a lonely thing not to have a father. Now she was like that girl. Her daddy was gone. She'd never see him again. It was from shock, from a sense of something stable gone out of her life that Julia Jean cried that day.

"I've got to stay here," Mother explained. "Now that Daddy's gone, I've got to make more money for both of us. You can make more money in 'Frisco than in Stockton, but I'll be away all day, and there just wouldn't be anyone to look after you. You'll have to go back with godmother." The thin little arms tightened convulsively, the wet face pressed closer, and how Mildred Turner found the strength to stick to her plan, she still doesn't know. "I'll come down every week-end, I'll bring you up here the first minute I can make you a home—oh, darling, don't cry so."

Two long years. Two pretty bad years but—as generally happens—not so bad in actuality as in prospect. There was the convent, which she still loved. There were the bright week-ends to look forward to. There was her natural buoyancy to help her over the rough spots. And there was the endless hoping and planning.

It came suddenly. In San Francisco Mrs. Turner met Lucile Meadows, who suggested that they open a shop of their own. "What's more, I've got another idea. You've been hankering to bring that youngster of yours up here. Why don't we take a big apartment and share it? Your Julia Jean's what? Eleven? Well, my Hazel's 13, and George is 14, and they'll be pals for each other, and you won't have to worry about leaving the kid alone."

Mrs. Turner stared at her. "You're an answer to prayer," she said.

As for Julia Jean, life began at 11. The Meadows were a gay, warm-hearted family who took her in and made her their own. George and Hazel called her their little sister. Business prospered at the beauty shop, and a little Spanish woman came to do the cooking. The kids helped with the housework, but not enough to hurt. The door was always open to their friends, and their favorite room was the big kitchen—full of laughter and beautiful smells—where they'd stage kitchen parties.

Soon Julia Jean was going to Presentation High, where the kids shortened her name to Judy. "Suits you better. Besides, the other's too long." By any name, you still couldn't get her to do her homework. Yet her grades were good in everything but math. Math threw her.

the devil and the dime store . . .

None of the crowd was allowed to use make-up, so they all did. Saturdays would find them in the Dime Store, squandering their substance—Judy got a dollar a week—on lipstick and horrible shades of powder, on junk jewelry and stockings at 39c. Since they couldn't use the make-up either at home or school, you'd have thought it was hardly worth the effort—if you didn't know kids. Every morning they'd get up 15 minutes early. Waiting for the bus, they'd daub this stuff on their faces. Unloading a block away from the school building—at a spot known as Make-up Corner—they'd haul out mirrors and tissue and vigorously remove every trace of the powder and lipstick they'd been applying with equal vigor ten minutes ago. Silly? Not at all. You just wouldn't feel dressed if you met in the bus without make-up.

Saturday nights they all went to the show. Having spent the afternoon at the Dime Store, Judy was insolvent by night. So George or Hazel supplied the necessary quarter, plus a nickel for a candy bar. Thus armed, ten or a dozen of them would scramble for seats well down front and give themselves up to rapture. Gable was their god. Shearer was their dream of what every girl ought to look like. They tried to copy her hair-dos. When she came out with the slick bob and the whirl over the forehead, Judy cut her own hair to get the desired effect. It wasn't so hot. One look sent Mother into hysterics.

175 EAST BROADWAY, NEW YORK 2, N. Y.

That was why she finally broke down during the Jean Harlow craze. "I want to be a platinum blonde," yammered Judy. Docile enough for the most part, there were times when a glint appeared in Judy's eye that meant business. Mother recognized that glint now and shuddered from the vision of what a home-made job might do to her child's beautiful mop.

"I don't like it," she said, "and I never will. But if you've made up your mind, come on over to the shop after school."

From Judy's viewpoint, it was a dazzling success. The job was done on a Friday. Friday night was basketball night. The boys called for the girls, they all met at a certain corner and took the street car.

Judy felt a little shy, going to the door when the bell rang.

"Judy in?" asked the boy.

Her eyes widened, and a thrill ran through her. He didn't know her. He'd seen her that afternoon at school, and he didn't know her. Goodness, what fun!

"No," she answered demurely, "but she'll be right back. Want to wait?"

He eyed her curiously. "Who're you?"

"I'm her cousin."

"I never saw you before."

"No, I—I just got here. From Idaho."

"Judy," called her mother. "Don't stand there with the door open. Bring your friend in."

"Judy!" His jaw dropped. "Say, what've you done to yourself?"

There were boys, of course. Not that she was allowed to go out with them, except when the crowd went together. But to be in the swim, you had to get a crush on someone every so often. Judy's crushes lasted about a week. One lasted a month. He was truly devoted—walked her home from school, carried her books and treated her to holes of the doughnut. You bought the holes instead of the doughnuts because they were only a penny apiece—tiny little balls, fried very crisp and simply delicious—when you were just 14 and munched them on a sunlit street with a laughing boy who carried your books.

Judy also had what she called a "silent love." Silent was right. He was a friend of George's who, when he noticed her at all, referred to her as "the babe in arms." Her admiration grew in proportion to his aloofness. Without losing any sleep, she wove her dreams around him.

"Do you have a boy friend?" asked a newcomer at school.

"Oh yes!" breathed Judy. "He's an older man. Eighteen."

"Eighteen? And he goes with you?"

Judy didn't care for the skeptical note. "Goes with me? Why, he's at my beck and call."

The height of her ambition was to be taken for older than her years. She'd even fib about her age when she thought she could get away with it. But her sins caught up with her. She had to have her appendix out, and at the hospital they put her in the children's ward.

"Don't tell the gang," she begged her mother. "Cross your heart you won't let them know where I am."

They found out though. In they trooped one afternoon, and there lay Judy—looking very sophisticated indeed in the silk nightie Mother had brought to console her, a flower in her hair—sandwiched between a tot of seven and, believe it or not, a baby of three months!

Her pals let her have it. "Introduce us to your little friends, precious."

"How old did you say you were? Sixteen? Or six?"

"What are you looking so grim about, honey? Are you teething?"

She never fibbed about her age again—not in so many words—just tried to act older. She had to, on account of the rat-races. That's what they called the school dances, thrown on Friday nights when there wasn't a basketball game. You couldn't go except with a legitimate date and, by Mother's ruling, dates were out. But she could always count on George and Hazel. "Oh, let her come, we'll look after her." George would slip her in, then go back to pick up his real date. She didn't have to worry about partners.

lovely word . . .

Five years of healthy, carefree girlhood —of laughter and comradeship and the thrilling sense of life just ahead which belongs only to youth. Not that Judy gave much thought to the future—the present was too all-absorbing. Of course when the kids got together and talked about what they were going to do, she had ideas, too.

"I'm going to be a biologist."

"Biologist! Judy Turner! Why, you can't even stand the sight of a bug, and a teentsy little moth drives you wild."

"So what? Biology's such a lovely word."

Later, she thought interior decorating would be nice. Or dress designing. School dramatics bored her. But once she got hooked. Or almost. For Joan of Arc yet.

"Hooray! I got out of it," she announced at home that night.

"How?"

"Well, there was just one way—to be bad enough so they'd kick me out."

They moved down to Los Angeles because Mrs. Turner caught one cold too many. She wrote to a friend in Hollywood, who wrote back: "My apartment's big enough for three. You can move right in." Mrs. Meadows bought out her interest in the shop, gave the two her blessing and a farewell blowout.

They drove down with two friends. The weather was drizzly. Just beyond Las Robles, the driver braked abruptly on a newly-paved stretch of road. They skidded, and the car turned over.

The other three managed to scramble out. Judy was dazed and had to be pulled out. Her side hurt, but otherwise she seemed all right. The first shock and anxiety over, they waited for a car to come. Nervously, the older women smoked.

Judy felt her time had come. It was her smash-up as much as anyone's. If it was true what they said, that cigarettes soothed you, she needed one—besides, she was 16.

"Mother, may I have a cigarette?"

Mother looked at her—such a look that it was on the tip of her tongue to say, "Never mind"—but something made her bite the words back. Miserably she took the cigarette, watched Mother strike a match, then blow it out.

"If you've got to smoke, go ahead. But I'm not going to light it for you."

Judy felt like a lamb turned out of the fold. She took one puff—a girl could do no less—sputtered and choked and threw the darn thing away.

At the hospital, they taped up her two broken ribs and treated Mrs. Turner for a slight concussion.

And that's how Lana Turner came to Hollywood—in a car with its side caved in. Not an impressive entry. But then Hollywood didn't impress her either.

Where was the shining avenue of dreams, spangled with Gables and Harlows and Shearers? This was nothing but a little old village street, overgrown, noisy, lined with ordinary shops, bustling with ordinary people like herself. She was six again, looking for the Golden Gate.

"Nuts,". said little Judy Turner and dropped her head on Mom's shoulder.

(STORY)

"Who?" the Governor yelled.

"Kockenlocker, Kockenlocker. K-O-C-K-E—Kockenlocker—"

"Wait a minute," the Governor said. "I want to get this absolutely straight now. Hold on a minute while I get my secretary to take down every word you say."

Looking through the window, waiting for the Governor, the editor watched the growing mob in the street outside. He couldn't help thinking of Trudy and everything that had happened to her since that first day of the Farewell Dance. Blonde, pretty, lively, beautiful Trudy. . . .

And Norval Jones, second assistant teller at the bank.

The night of the farewell dance she was going to the movies with Norval. Or at least that's what she told her father. Pa wouldn't hear of her going to the dance. He knew soldiers, didn't he? He'd been in the last war. Farewell dance! Sure, it began down in the church basement, and then maybe out to the country club, and then maybe down to a boogie-woogie joint. Keep away from soldiers, Pa always said.

"I'm only going to the movies with Norval," Trudy said.

"Fine," Pa said. "Stick to Norval."

So she started down the street with Norval, and when they got around the corner to the car, she took his arm, and Norval smiled at her and she smiled back at him.

"Gee, Trudy," he said, "I can't think of anything I'd rather do, except maybe be in the Army, than go to a movie with you. Even a triple feature."

"That's awfully sweet of you, Norval," Trudy said.

"It's the truth," Norval said. "The only thing I wish is that I could be in uniform and still take you to the movies. But you know—the spots."

"The spots," Trudy said sadly.

"I'm perfectly fine until I get right up there before the doctor. Then all of a sudden my heart begins to beat fast, and they tell me not to get excited. And I'm not excited. I'm cool as ice. And then the next minute—"

"The spots," Trudy said.

"—and they tell me to go home again and take it easy. I can't think of anything I'd rather do than be in the Army. Unless it's being with you, Trudy . . ."

"It must be hard being in the Army," Trudy said.

"Sure it's hard."

"I don't mean physically. I mean when you have to go away. And there's nobody to say good-by to you."

"Oh, the Sergeant says good-by," Norval said.

"But it should be different," Trudy said. "There should be fun. And dancing. And maybe a girl to wave to—"

"That's why they have the farewell dance," Norval said.

"That's what I mean," Trudy said. "The farewell dance."

"Trudy—" Norval said.

"Norval, you wouldn't want me to let those poor guys go off alone without even saying good-by to them. It could be so easy. Now you go right on to the pictures—"

"Three features," Norval said. "You want me to sit through three features all alone?"

"—and then I could pick you up at the end of the show. And Papa would never know the difference. And I could say good-by to the soldiers. And—"

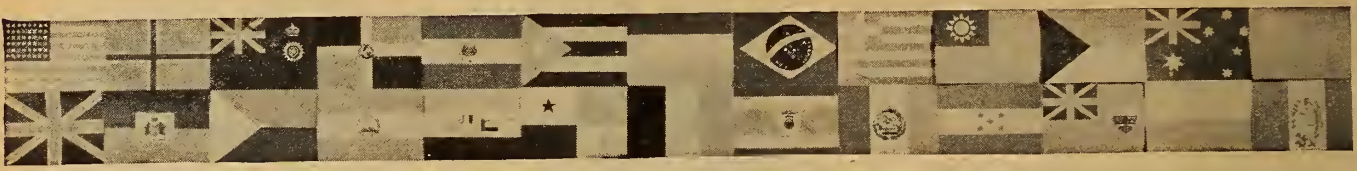
The ninth in our series on THE FOODS OF OUR ALLIES



Norwegian by birth, undisputed Ice Skating Queen by virtue of being three-time winner of Olympic Figure Skating Championship, and many-time winner of European and World Championships!

Star of 20th Century-Fox's musical extravaganza, "Winter Time" and now touring with her "Hollywood Ice Revue," Sonja Henie—when time permits—enjoys making rich Norwegian-style cookies.

NORWAY

"IF THERE IS ANYONE who still wonders why this war is being fought, let him look to Norway. If there is anyone who has any delusions that this war could have been averted, let him look to Norway. And if there is anyone who doubts of the democratic will to win, again I say, let him look to Norway.

"He will find in Norway, at once conquered and unconquerable, the answer to his questioning."

FRANKLIN DELANO ROOSEVELT

Some seven years ago, a blonde and dimpled little Norwegian girl—then totally unknown in America, although already famous on the Continent as an extraordinarily skillful figure skater—arrived over here to glide and spin and smile her way into the hearts of a vast army of movie fans. This was, of course, Sonja Henie. So, for our series on The Foods of Our Allies—remembering the country of her origin and her popularity with our readers—we naturally decided to ask Miss Henie to represent her native Norway.

Norway—"Land of the Midnight Sun," of peaceful fjords and mighty glaciers—once described by such lovely words as "serene" and "tranquil." Norway—Land of the Vikings—whose ships and sailors still roam the seven seas! Carrying, now, the tools of war to the battlefields of the world for the benefit of our mutual cause. Waiting for the glorious day when they can return to their home ports laden with the supplies of peace; when, once again, the liberty-loving Norwegians can resume the way of life they loved. It is for this future occasion and in this expectation that the indomitable Norwegians fight on!

In happier times now past, the people of this little kingdom "at the roof of the world" enjoyed, according to Sonja Henie, one of the highest standards of living; which included excellent and abundant food. It was shortly before the holidays when we interviewed Sonja about Norwegian cooking, so she naturally spoke of Christmas celebrations she remembered as a child. Of the festivities that lasted for a full week. Of the corn and the suet that were hung on the fir trees for the birds to eat . . . "a sight so beautiful, so peaceful, that it greatly enhanced the Yuletide spirit," is the way Sonja put it.

She also described the many types of rich cookies that were "musts" at that time of the year and were welcome treats at all other seasons, as well. (Of these cookies more, later on.) Miss Henie spoke of Fish Pudding as her favorite Norwegian dish and said that whenever she and her mother were in New York, they would immediately place an order for one of these specialties with Sophie Madsen, who makes and sells them. However, despite her enthusiasm for Norwegian Fish Pudding, Miss Henie was reluctant to give us the recipe. "To make this dish," she explained, "takes so much time that I doubt if Americans would think it worth the effort. Why, in the country districts of Norway," she went on, "they pound the fish for four hours in a wooden bowl! Of course, it is possible to get good results by putting the fish through a food grinder six or seven times—using the finest blade—but even so it is a lot of bother."

So, instead, Miss Henie suggested that we concentrate on other, easier-to-follow recipes. For example:

There's Benlöse Fugler, or Boneless Birds—a meat dish that "goes easy" on both points and pennies. Risengrynsgröt—a nutritious, inexpensive pudding that is especially delectable when accompanied by the Rod Saus given below. And, to serve with coffee, there's Kringle—one of the rich coffee cakes for which all Scandinavians are famous. And Fattigmanns Bakkels—a deep-fat-fried specialty. Also, a rich cookie once known as Berlinerkranser, but now called Oslokranser—for good and sufficient reasons, as I'm sure you'll agree after a short study of the two names.

ROD SAUS
(Red Sauce for Desserts)

Wash and pick over 2 cups cranberries.* Cook with 1 cup water until all skins pop open. Strain through fine sieve. (In order to have a clear sauce, be sure not to force any of pulp through strainer.) Return juice to saucepan, add ¾ cup sugar combined with 1½ tablespoons cornstarch. Cook and stir until clear and slightly thickened. Remove from heat immediately. If desired, sprinkle with mace. Serve hot or cold.

In Norway, Rod Saus is made with the juice of any seasonal red (rod) fruits. For this country and season, cranberries are ideal.*

We have had the above mentioned recipes printed up in the form of a little folder which you will certainly want to send for if you're interested in foreign foods, in general, and in the dishes from Norway that Sonja favors, in particular. So just use this coupon or simply drop us a postal.

"No," Norval said. "Three features, Trudy. All alone!"

"Norval . . ." Trudy said. "For me?"

"I don't know why I do it," Norval said. "I don't know why I do it. Three features . . . the spots . . . all alone. I don't know why I do it!"

having wonderful time . . .

Trudy had a lovely time. They began in the church basement drinking lemonade without sugar, and she danced with a soldier six feet tall and she danced with one five feet one. There was one with curly black hair. One was bald. Then they all piled into a car, and they drove out to the country club, and it was all glitter and a band playing soft music and someone said: "Champagne for everybody!" So they danced and drank champagne, and a soldier said: "I got an idea. Let's all get married." They laughed, and after a while they weren't at the country club any more. They were in a boogie-woogie joint, and Trudy was beating it out with the big soldier with the broad shoulders and the curly black hair or maybe it was the short, bald one. It was so hard to keep things straight. There was a funny glittering thing on the low ceiling, and the soldier she was dancing with twirled her off to the right and bounced her high, and sure enough she cracked her head on the big glittering thing in the middle of the ceiling and landed all sprawled out on the floor while the whole crowd laughed and she kept saying: "What's the joke, what's the joke?"

headaches and hangovers . . .

It was eight o'clock in the morning before she turned up driving Norval's car erratically down the Main street of Morgan's Creek toward the movie house.

Norval was waiting.

It was eight-fifteen before Norval finally got her home while she kept singing and insisting that she never drank anything stronger than lemonade. At Trudy's house, he picked her up and carried her, staggering a little under the weight, up the front porch steps.

Papa was waiting.

It was eight-seventeen and a half before Norval finally ducked under Papa's outraged left hand jab and made a clean break for his car. It was eight-eighteen and a quarter when Papa reached for singing Trudy, missed his grip and sprawled flat on his back in the living room, while Trudy raced up to her room.

Emmy was waiting.

Emmy was Trudy's kid sister. She wasn't blonde, and she was a little gawky, but she made up for it because her head was stuffed with that good grey stuff sometimes called brains or common sense.

"How could you do it?" Emmy said. "Stay out to eight o'clock in the morning. You knew Pa would be hopping mad."

"Oh, we had a wonderful time—" Trudy said.

"Sure, and you said good-by to the whole U. S. Army. Plus the Navy and the Marine Corps—"

"And we danced. And we had fun. And a fellow kept saying let's all get married. Wasn't that silly? Marry some fellow you never saw before and maybe never see again—"

"Someone certainly had some dopey ideas," Emmy said.

"Sure. You can't get married that way. Just some fellow. Using a curtain ring for a marriage band and—"

"Trudy!" Emmy said.

"What's the matter?" Trudy said.

"Trudy, what's that on your finger?"

They looked down at it. There it was on the fourth finger. A curtain ring, and if you turned it a little, it looked almost exactly like a bona fide marriage band.

"Trudy!" Emmy said. "You didn't! You didn't fall for that guff. You didn't get married!"

And then suddenly, very sharply, Trudy was cold sober.

"Married?" she said. "Emmy, I don't know. Maybe I did. I remember we were all dancing and then . . . and then . . . I can't remember anything more. There was something glittering up on the ceiling, and someone kept saying let's all get married . . . And I don't remember . . ."

"If you did get married," Emmy said, "you'd know the guy's name at least. Who was the guy you were out with?"

"I don't know . . . there were so many. There was a fellow with curly black hair. And another one. There was a fellow whose name had an 'atski' in it. Like Ratziwatski. Or something . . ."

"That's a help," Emmy said, then she snapped her fingers. "We can find out in a minute. If you got married, you'd sign your name. It'll be in the register. We can find out if you got married and whom you got married to."

Emmy started for the door purposefully.

Trudy said: "Wait a minute. I remember something else. I remember someone saying: 'Don't give your right name' . . ."

Emmy almost fainted: "You mean you didn't give your right name. And you don't know the name of the fellow you married—"

"I guess that's how it must have been," Trudy said slowly.

"Trudy!" Emmy wailed. "Trudy!"

As it turned out there was no doubt at all that Trudy had been married.

Because the doctor said she was going to have a baby.

Emmy was tight-lipped when she heard the news. "That does it," she said. "You know you were married. And I know it. But who else is going to believe it? Are you sure you can't remember the name of the soldier?"

"Oh, I don't know," Trudy said. "Ratziwatski. Or something."

"Oh murder!" Emmy said. "You know what they're going to be saying. You know what Papa's going to say. You know what he'll do to Norval—"

"Norval!" Trudy said. "What has Norval got to do with it?"

"Well, he was the guy you were out with until eight o'clock that morning."

"But—"

"But nothing," Emmy said. "Just wait till Papa finds out about this thing."

BLACKHEADS, BIG PORES

show up quickly in these "Danger Zones" of your skin!

Read how my 4-Purpose Face Cream keeps your skin crystal-clean and fresh — and guards against these skin troubles.

NO one needs to tell you that there are "danger zones" of the skin. You know! For your own mirror has warned you about them, many times.

You know, for example. that the curve next to your nose—the tiny valleys of your chin—are two zones that must be watched. For there's where skin troubles get their start, and make swift headway.

In the curve beside your nose, pores often become bigger and bigger — until they look conspicuous and coarse. Around your mouth and chin, dirt and grease tend to accumulate and harden into blackheads.

But you can be sure you won't have any of these skin troubles, if you use Lady Esther 4-Purpose Face Cream! For it guards these two danger zones, guards all the danger zones of your skin!

Each time you apply Lady Esther Face Cream it does these 4 vital things: (1) It thoroughly cleans your skin. (2) It softens your skin, loosens and absorbs the dry, clinging flakes. (3) It helps nature refine the pores. (4) It leaves a smooth perfect base for powder.

Living Proof—In Your Own Mirror!

Why choose a face cream because it's expensive, or because of a clever package? Judge it only by what it does for your skin!

That's why I say — try Lady Esther 4-Purpose Face Cream! Get the smallest size jar if you like—but try it! When you see how radiantly clean and fresh your skin looks after the very first application—when you see how much smoother and more youthful it appears—it's time enough to get the largest and most economical size. But for living proof this is the most beautifying cream you have ever used, get the small-size jar today!

"We can't let that happen to Norval. Papa'll shoot him."

"Wait a minute," Emmy said. "Norval. There's the answer. Norval. You were out with him that night. He's crazy about you. You've got to have a husband. He's made for it. He's a schnook. And that's what we need now. He's perfect."

poor fish . . .

"Emmy," Trudy said. "You don't know what you're saying."

"Don't I?" Emmy said. "Listen, baby, you're going to marry Norval."

It was easy. It was so easy that it hurt. Norval came over for dinner, and the way he sat at the end of the table always looking at Trudy, you could see it in his eyes and in his face and even in the way he fumbled with his fork. He was so much in love with Trudy, he didn't even know what he was eating.

Papa kept talking about marriage and daughters and what a pain in the neck both of them were. Papa kept saying that the only reason he was a cop was because he could yell at women drivers. Papa kept saying marriage was for dopes and 100 per cent of the human race was dopes.

Out on the porch later, just the two of them, Trudy said: "I hope you don't think Papa was talking too much about marriage tonight."

"I don't mind," Norval said. "I like to hear people talk about marriage. Only it isn't always the right people—"

"Even the . . . right people . . . think about marriage sometimes," Trudy said.

"Do they? They never tell me."

"Maybe it's because you don't ask," Trudy said.

It was dark on the porch, and only the glimmer of light from the moon lit the old, polished planking. There was the smell of Spring in the air, of fresh grass and roses, and there was a soft wind blowing off the face of Morgan's Creek.

"Trudy," Norval said. "What do you mean, they don't ask . . ."

"Well, they don't ask," Trudy said.

"Trudy," Norval said, "do you mean . . . do you mean . . ."

"Don't get excited. Remember your blood pressure."

"Why shouldn't I get excited?" Norval said. "Do you mean, Trudy, do you mean . . ."

"What?" Trudy said. "Say it Norval."

"Would you marry me, Trudy?"

And then suddenly he was on his knees, and he was talking in a flood of words, holding her hand, looking up at her.

"Trudy," he said, "I always thought about it. I dreamt about it. When we were kids in school . . . gee, you were still wearing pigtails . . . I fell in love with you then. And I've never been out of it. In high school. And afterwards. I always hoped. I never thought really that you could love a guy like me. I know I'm not handsome. I'm not even anything. I just know I'm so crazy about you there's nothing in the world I'd want more than marrying you."

"Norval," Trudy said. "I never knew . . ."

"Trudy, would you. You were talking now almost like you were in love with me. . ."

"I can't do it to you," Trudy said. "I can't, I can't. You're so sweet, Norval. You're so good."

"What are you talking about, Trudy?" Norval said. "What can't you do to me? What's it all about, Trudy? The spots . . . what's it all about?"

"Maybe you wouldn't want to marry me," Trudy said.

"What are you talking about, Trudy?" Norval shouted. "Trudy you're crazy."

"No, I'm not," Trudy said.

"You must be crazy thinking I wouldn't want to marry you," Norval said excitedly. "If you're not crazy, what are you?"

"I'm married," Trudy said.

"The spots . . ." Norval yelled, "the spots . . . did you say you were married?"

"Yes. Only I don't know his name. And there isn't any record. So I can't let you marry me. It would be bigamy. Or something."

It was two days before Norval thought of anything. Then that evening, he drove up, and he beckoned mysteriously to Trudy.

norval comes through . . .

"Ratziwatski is going to marry you."

"Did you find him?" Trudy said.

"I didn't find him," Norval said. "I'm Ratziwatski. Look, Trudy, what you need is a certificate, that's all. A marriage certificate that says Trudy Kockenlocker married Ratziwatski. So why can't we go down to a Justice of the Peace, and I'll say I'm Ratziwatski and we'll get the certificate? And that way everything will be fine. It's foolproof. It solves everything. It's almost legal."

"Norval," Trudy said, "I can't let you. Besides Ratziwatski was a soldier, and he had a uniform."

"Of course you can let me," Norval said. "You got to. That's all I want to do. I just want to help you. And I even have the uniform. Now you just leave everything to me."

Maybe the uniform Norval got was a little big. And maybe it was really a uniform from World War I. It didn't look too good, but maybe Norval wouldn't look too good in a uniform anyway. Besides, the Justice of the Peace didn't seem to notice, and he went through the whole ceremony. It was all done, all finished.

The Justice of the Peace said: "Sign here, please."

And Norval took the register and signed in his best Palmer handwriting. He signed: NORVAL JONES.

"Just a minute," the Justice of the Peace said narrowly. "Just a minute, there, big boy. What goes on here?"

He pulled out a huge pistol and brandished it under Norval's nose.

"Norval," Trudy wailed, "Norval—"

"I thought his name was Ignatz Rattywatty. Abducting the girl, eh? Min," he shouted to his wife. "Call up the Sheriff. Get in touch with the Military Police. Ring the F.B.I. We got something here!"

Norval ended up in jail.

Back at the house, Trudy was weeping. "I love him," she said. "He was so good. And now—"

"Love!" Emmy said. "Be practical!"

"I don't care," Trudy said. "I love him. And I married him. It's all in the certificate."

"That's it," Emmy said excitedly. "Sure it's in the certificate. That fixes that, anyway. You got the certificate to prove you're married, at least."

Officer Kockenlocker knocked on the door and then came into the bedroom. He looked at the two girls morosely.

"Daughters," he said bitterly.

"Cut it out," Emmy said. "She feels bad enough anyway."

"She feels bad," Officer Kockenlocker said. "How do you think she'd feel married to a guy wanted by every policeman in the country. I took care of that anyway."

"What do you mean you took care of that?" Emmy said.

"Your old man isn't such a dope," Officer Kockenlocker said. "I got the J. P. to tear up the certificate. No one will ever know she married the jerk."

"You what?" Emmy said. "Oh, no, Papa. You couldn't be that dumb."

"Listen, you underdone stringbean—"

"Shall we tell him?" Emmy said.

"I'm married," Trudy said. "I'm going to have a baby."

Officer Kockenlocker swayed. Then he roared: "What! A baby."

"A baby," Emmy said. "The patter of little feet."

There was only one thing to do. They had to get Norval out. They went down to the jail late that night, and they found Norval in his cell looking at the bars on the window. He looked sad.

Norval said he couldn't escape. Norval said that would only get Officer Kockenlocker into trouble, and he'd probably lose his job and never get his pension—"

"Norval, you must. For my sake," Trudy said. "I could never rest if I knew you were in jail."

"Sure," Emmy said. "Find that Ratziwatski guy. That would solve everything."

Norval said slowly: "That's true. If I could find him for Trudy, then everybody would know Trudy was really married. Only I'd need money. I'll have to look for him. I have money in the bank. Only it's in bonds—"

"That helps," Officer Kockenlocker said.

"Do you think it would be wrong," Norval said, "if I left the bonds and just took the money? I have a key to the bank, and we could get it now. It would only take a minute."

Officer Kockenlocker groaned: "All right, rob the bank. Go ahead. Only escape, will you? I can't stand my daughter's crying all the time."

"Good-by, Trudy," Norval said. "Don't worry."

"Good-by, Norval," Trudy said. "I love you."

"Isn't it funny," Norval said. "That's the only thing that matters."

"Very funny," Officer Kockenlocker said. "I could die laughing."

So that's how the robbery happened at the Morgan's Creek Bank, and that's how the famous jail-break of Norval Jones occurred. He disappeared. He disappeared in the Spring, and he wasn't seen again until the snow was on the ground and the frost was in the air.

miracle at christmas . . .

It was Christmas.

But there was an evil star that followed Norval, and no sooner was he in town than he was immediately spotted. And no sooner was he spotted, than immediately he was once more jugged.

The news reached the Kockenlockers on a small farm just outside the city limits of Morgan's Creek. They had been living there secretly ever since Officer Kockenlocker was fired after Norval's jail-break.

"He dood it again," Emmy said sadly. "In the can."

"I've got to go into town," Trudy said. "I've got to tell them the whole story. They can't keep Norval in jail."

Officer Kockenlocker said, "We've been trying to keep the secret, and no one knows you're going to have a baby. Go into town now and . . ."

"I've got to," Trudy said.

They reached town just as the conference was taking place at the firehouse. The town elders were discussing the fate of Norval Jones. Officer Kockenlocker wearily climbed the stairs and stood before them.

"My daughter has something she wants to tell you gentlemen," he said heavily.

"Let her come in," said Mr. Tuerck, the town banker.

"I'm afraid you'll have to come down to her. She's—"

Emmy's voice rose piercingly in the air; she came tumbling up the stairs: "Papa! Papa! Trudy—"

"Is there a doctor in the house?" Officer Kockenlocker roared.

And then the miracle happened at Morgan's Creek.

God moves in mysterious ways, and when He takes a hand in human affairs, mountains are moved and the seas divide. And so it came to pass that a miracle happened. And before the shock and the wonder of it had passed, the news raced around the world. The important people in this miracle were Norval Jones and Trudy Kockenlocker. The miracle suited them fine. More or less. It was fine enough so that they found themselves married, and Norval got a Colonel's uniform in the State Guard and the Governor himself congratulated them. There was one other thing. Of course—

They lived happily ever after.

A GUY NAMED JOE

Welles' Hollywood tent show for soldiers that played seven nights a week for six weeks. He's the most scrambled after leading man in Hollywood with producers practically lining up at David Selznick's chanting, "We want Cotten!"

In spite of all this hullabaloo, Joe Cotten is taking plenty of time out for laughs and living and giving Hollywood hooey the back of his hand. He's staying Joe Cotten all the time—which is to say a gay, straightforward guy with an indestructible sense of humor and the queer, unHollywood knack of squeezing a good time out of every minute.

The other day Joe got a fan letter from a snooty Boston lady. It was on elegant, crested and engraved note paper.

"Dear Mr. Cotten," it read. "Kindly forward an autographed portrait of yourself—for the servants, of course."

Joe roared when he read that one. He thought it was wonderful. He mailed the picture as requested. He also sent along a letter he spent a whole evening composing and a book he spent most of one afternoon digging up in Hollywood. The letter stated in flowery phrases how flattered he was to comply with the lady's request. The enclosed book, he pointed out, was an elementary reader and spelling guide, and he said it was his earnest wish that after diligent study the lady's servants would be able to write and ask for their own photographs!

Following up a funny gag like that gives Joe Cotten a bigger kick than getting a raise in salary. The odd part is, you'd never in a million years suspect he's blessed with an oversized funnybone and as full of beans as a Navy mess kit until you meet him in person. In "Citizen Kane" Joe played his first Hollywood scene as an old man mumbling through his silvery moustache in a wheel chair. And ever since he's been somebody's father or uncle or something equally sedate and mature. You have to know Joe slicing a "tomato" . . .

A few lucky people had that chance not long ago when Joe let loose and clowned through the magic show that he and Orson Welles tossed in a tent for Hollywood service men. Joe had the time of his life riding a stuffed lion, helping saw Hollywood tootsies in half and getting slapstick belly laughs from the crowd.

I'll have to tell a story on Joe Cotten about that show. The afternoon Orson Welles and Rita Hayworth got married, Joe, being Orson's chum, was best man. After the nuptials in Santa Monica, the wedding party came to Joe's house in nearby Pacific Palisades for a spot of refreshments. They had only a couple of hours before the show went on at eight o'clock, and they devoted most of that celebrating with champagne. When they showed up at curtain time everyone, including Joe, was happily confused.

The spot in Orson's magic program arrived where Joe had to fire a pistol into a trunk where a lovely Hollywood star has just been locked, all tied up in a sack. He was supposed to cry, "Now, ladies and gentlemen, I will shoot this pistol into the trunk!" Instead, Joe's tongue, wobbly from bubble-water, shouted, "Ladies and gentlemen, I will now shoot the bag in the trunk!" Then he went ba-loom! And out popped the lovely star—Marlene Dietrich!

"Who called me a bag?" she inquired coolly. Joe and the audience roared.

no chuckle-charley . . .

I don't mean to make Joe out as Joe the Joker. He isn't any gag artist or Chuckle-Charley. But he gets such a kick out of everything, and he's so open and honest about it that everything's a ton of fun for everybody concerned—even when the situation has the makings of being strained. Joe is canny enough about his career, but he's so easy-going and jovial about it that he doesn't make enemies.

For instance, when "This Is the Army" was casting, boss Jack Warner wanted Joe Cotten for the hoofer part that George Murphy later did. Joe knew it wasn't for him from the start, but at Warner's insistence he took a crack at tap dancing—and it didn't work. He had to explain why he thought he shouldn't attempt the part, so he went into Warner's office one day to explain. "I can't do it," said Joe.

"Why?" Warner wanted to know, peeved.

Joe didn't explain. He never said a word. Instead, he broke into his tap dance. He hopped all round the room in his clumsy off-to-Buffalos and jigs. The furniture bounced around, and Joe's off-beat steps almost wrecked the place. He kept it up until Warner wiped his eyes and cried, "Stop it! Okay—you win! You don't get the part."

When you meet Joe Cotten, the first thing you notice are the laugh wrinkles around his eyes and the way every movement he makes is charged with life and bounce and vitality. You'd never in a million years guess he has seen 38 summers. His six-foot-two frame is as trim as a boy's, with no more waistline than a yellowjacket. With the terrific tan he has collected since he came to California, he stacks up like a bronze Greek statue under his mop of yellow clinging curls. You'd expect to find Joe on a college campus booting a football.

Joe and Lenore Kipp, a bright and extremely attractive blonde, have been married 12 years, and the ups and downs of an actor's career have never made a speck of difference in their happiness. For years in New York, while Joe ore, from a socially prominent family and an editor of a big fashion magazine, was the one who rated. Joe was "Lenore Kipp's husband—an actor fellow, y'know." Now in Hollywood Lenore is Joe Cotten's wife—"non-professional." In neither case has either had a tremor of jealousy. In fact, they've become so close that Joe actually has confidence enough to shop for Lenore's clothes—and greater courage hath no man than that.

Joe and Lenore met years ago in Miami, Florida. Joe was peddling newspaper advertising then, among other things, and having a lot of hobby fun promoting and acting in a little theater in Miami of nights. The theater got to be fairly fashionable with the winter colony, and Lenore Kipp, vacationing in Miami, started taking it in. Then, as now, she was a brilliant musician, and one night Joe had to play a piano on the stage, and he couldn't even pound out chopsticks. Someone prevailed on Lenore to rip off the music backstage while Joe faked it before the footlights. They met after the performance, and that started things.

5th cousin to a sea slug . . .

At that point, Lenore Kipp's opinion of actors was that they rated some seven notches below a sea slug in the scale of animal life. But when she met Joe, she discovered actors can be real persons, too—if they happen to be Joe Cotten.

In fact, Lenore tumbled so hard for Joe's charm that she found herself telling him he was too good to fool around in Miami with amateur theatricals, that he ought to tackle Broadway. And Joe fell so hard for pretty Lenore that he listened and hopped a train to New York. They were married about a year later on practically no prospects. For their wedding supper they went to a Chinese chop suey joint! They lived for years in a tiny Greenwich Village apartment.

Home today for the Cottens is a comfortable Monterey type house on an oleander lined lane in Pacific Palisades beachways from Hollywood, overlooking the ocean.

It has a swell tennis court and a tidy swimming pool (both are Joe's very favorite sports). Both the inside and outside of the house show the distinctive imprint of the Cottens, although they've been there less than two years. I've never seen a more comfortably furnished house or one done in better taste. Both Joe and Lenore know nice things when they see them; scattered around are some wonderful old antique pieces Joe has collected in his home state of Virginia, and a few things he has put together himself, including the biggest bookcase you ever saw.

Judy's horse, Blackberry (a present from O. Welles), a cat, a canary and an amiable red Irish setter, Jack, fill out the Cotten household. Jack was a gift from Joe's friend, producer Jack Moss, so Joe called him Jack. The funny part is, he won't answer to anything else but "Joe." Joe suspects that Jack trained him that way before handing him over.

Joe Cotten gets a tremendous kick out of his home. Among his pals, he's notorious about it. Recently he went for an evening at a friend's house who lived to heck and gone away. Joe hadn't been there much more than an hour when he suggested brightly, "How about going over to my place for a drink?" The friend blew up. "That" he said, "is a pretty long way to go for a drink. For gosh sakes, Joe, can't you have any fun away from your own house?"

"Well," confessed Joe with a grin,

"frankly, no. I do try, but somehow. . . ."

His idea of a perfect day is to work in the morning, have a hot set of tennis in the afternoon (he's good at it and takes it seriously), then an evening at home with some pals he likes. Joe takes no regimented care at all of his swell build which still looks about like it did when he played pro football as a youth around Washington, D. C. He eats everything he wants with a meat-and-potato appetite which never flags, likes a drink or two before dinner. But he hasn't an inch of fat and never seems to collect the stuff. Of course Joe works plenty of it off these days because he keeps going from early dawn to dusk around the studios most days. Then, too, Joe's a great night owl, burying himself in bed under books—he likes biographies best—until he drops off to sleep. Joe has good solid tastes in all things cultured—music, drama, literature and art.

In all his creative comforts, Joe's an epicurean and admits it. He likes good clothes and fine food, drink and tobacco and the comforts of living. Even when his bank account was anemic in early Broadway days he always wore handmade shoes and tailored suits. He's had to cut a lot of that out since the war, of course, but before the Japs got nasty, Joe used to love to get on a train in the best space available and travel in style, keeping the porter hopping. In his early Hollywood days, when he wasn't so busy, he missed New York a lot. So he'd hop on a train and go up to San Francisco and just wander about that cosmopolitan town, staying in the best hotels, taking in all the fancy restaurants, all dressed up to kill, even to yellow chamois gloves!

Even when he's around the house today, Joe is meticulous about his person. He's a water otter, with at least three showers and a couple of shaves a day, whether he's working or lounging. There's nothing sloppy about Joe. He's always changing clothes, and he still has a prewar wardrobe that would knock your eye out. The point is, Joe Cotten believes that life is designed to enjoy.

Joe has never failed to click with the people he works with. He played a couple of years with Katharine Hepburn in "The Philadelphia Story," and Katie, notoriously, is brittle-tempered and not exactly the pal type to her colleagues, especially when she's keyed up and on the beam in a part. But Joe is crazy about her and she him still (her picture is in his den), and he thinks the two years he spent with "The Philadelphia Story" and La Hepburn were a couple of the pleasantest in his stage life.

Of all his friends, and by now he knows most of Hollywood, Orson Welles is the closest to Joe Cotten and the guy who vibrates in tune with him more than anyone else. Orson and Joe met in New York some years ago at a radio studio. Joe had finally made a name of sorts for himself on the stage and was picking up additional chips acting on the air. He landed on one with Orson, the boy genius, and on the air another ether ham made a very funny fluff right when the plot was thickening seriously.

Orson exploded with laughter right over the air, and Joe joined in. When the show was over, they were booted together out of the studio and became firm friends!

Most people today don't know that Joe Cotten wrote a lot of the famous Welles Mercury Theater air shows. Not the famous "Men from Mars" one (Joe was out of town then, and it burnt him up to find he'd missed all the fun). For that matter, Joe Cotten authored the script of a movie he made in Hollywood, "Journey into Fear," which was not so hot. "Journey into Fear" made Joe out on the screen as a sort of a jerk. This was later brought to his attention.

"What can you expect?" grinned Joe, "I wrote it." Both Joe and Orson would rather take pokes at themselves for their failures than let anybody else do the poking. Joe loves today to tell about the dozens of Hollywood screen tests he used to take in New York, and how lousy they all were. Once he thought he had made it. He had practically signed on the dotted line with a big studio when suddenly the deal stopped cold, and an ominous silence developed. Joe called up the director. "Yes," the Hollywood guy admitted, "we thought you were okay at first. But that egg-shaped head of yours kills it!"

houdini with a chinese accent . . .

There's nothing Joe Cotten and Orson Welles would rather do than both sprawl their six foot-plus frames out in the easy chairs at Joe's and start cooking up something daring and different. The recent servicemen's magic show is a perfect example. That started months ago when Joe and Orson, over a few snorts, started working out bigger and better magic illusions than the pro magicians could think up. Pretty soon they got all steamed up about turning Thurston and Houdini. So they went up to the California State Fair at Sacramento last year and tried out their acts, dolling themselves up in Mandarin coats and doing all the presto-change with a Chinese accent. The funny part was, they never knew how it worked because they operated in some sort of a stadium, and they were so far away from the audience nobody knew what they were doing! Undaunted, the pair of Merlins started all over again in Hollywood, arranged for a tiny showhouse downtown and started rehearsing. They did that for 16 weeks, nights and week-ends, then the theater got sold from underneath them, and the show had to go on in a tent. Then Rita Hayworth's studio boss refused to let her appear after the opening night, and a couple of dozen other things went wrong. But the show went on and was one of the brightest bits of soldier entertainment Hollywood has produced.

Neither considers money important. Joe in fact, is the kind of person who always has a balance of about $1.98 in the bank and doesn't let it worry him. He's making more money than he ever did in his life right now—already he's in the four figure list—but outside of the big chunk he puts in War Bonds every week, he's not getting rich. He's generous to a fault—the kind of person who always manages to grab the check first—and an easy touch for his improvident pals.

When Joe first came to Hollywood, a trainer in a Manhattan badminton club named "Shorty" used to write him. Joe liked Shorty as he likes everybody and he replied. In a postcard he mentioned that he was "having servant trouble."

The next thing Joe knew there was a telegram from Shorty, "Your servant troubles are over," it announced. "Am on my way to California."

shorty takes over . . .

So Joe hired Shorty as his man of all jobs. Shorty took over so completely that he soon threatened to run Joe's home life for him, and finally Lenore rebelled. And now Shorty, his cockiness undiminished, is the major domo, grand vizier and manager of the Welles-Hayworth menage.

Joe Cotten by now knows dramatics backwards and forwards, and his easy going manner is a mask for solid know-how in show business that could make him a writer, director or producer tomorrow—if acting ever bored him. Right now it doesn't—nothing about it. Every part is a picnic. "Acting's a lot easier when you kid around," says Joe. "You start getting too serious and you end up with indigestion!"

Even the bothersome details of being a Hollywood star don't give Joe the yawns. He answers every one of the thousands of letters he receives and gets a kick out of his fan mail. That traces away back years ago when Joe was a poverty ridden actor, playing in a roadshow. One gloomy Sunday he unburdened himself in writing to a Hollywood star. The letter was sincere, and Joe even illustrated it with funny sketches. He thought it deserved an answer. None ever came. That burnt him up, and he resolved then and there he'd never be so rude.

There's one thing that doesn't bother him though it does most stars. Since he has become a screen star, Joe doesn't have to worry that people might think him standoffish. He couldn't be standoffish if he tried! He has a big fire engine bell on his auto, and if he ever makes his dream tour and gets that Hollywood glamour treatment anywhere, why, he'll just clang the bell.

"If that doesn't get me an audience," grins Joe, "nothing will!"

we have been separated. I cannot bear it—I must write you this letter to tell you how much I miss you. . . .”

Well, that's the way his wife feels about Jean Pierre Aumont, and when you see him, you understand why. The Hollywoods are full of blond young men with handsome tans and brilliant blue eyes. Some of them can even act. “But nobody,” says Maria fondly, “is like Jean Pierre.”

He and Maria Montez were married in July, and you know how it is with Hollywood marriages. There are so many adjustments to make, each other's career to consider and arguments about this or that. But not with Jean and Maria. They like the same things and the same people, and besides, nobody could start an argument with Jean Pierre. He'd just grin. Jean is French, but his grin is as American as a candy bar. Faced with it, you have to grin, too, and the argument dissolves before it starts.

“Our marriage,” Jean says, “is as perfect as anything could be without being dull.” They do disagree on just enough things to keep from being bored. The matter of clothes, for instance. That starts a discussion once in a while.

“I pick out my own clothes,” Maria announced firmly after their marriage.

“Yes, my sweet. But after you pick them, I will be the censor. I will look over the final result, and if it is not exactly right, I will say, ‘Take off this’ or ‘Put on that.’ ”

“And I will do it,” Maria promised. She does, too. “He has the very good taste, that one,” she confides to friends.

This system has the additional advantage of working both ways. Maria didn't use to approve of Jean Pierre's ties.

“Oh, darling, your ties they are not right,” she would sigh. So now Jean wears plain unpatterned ties, and Maria nods with complete approval.

rose-colored blinders . . .

Just before they were married, the question of perfume arose in a rather funny way. Jean had a date with Maria. He had already sent her flowers to wear, but on the way to meet her, he thought “She is so lovely—I must bring her a little present so she will kiss me and say, ‘Thank you, darling!’ ” He stopped and bought her an enormous, and very expensive, bottle of cologne. He didn't notice that her eyebrows had gone up to here when she looked at the label on the bottle. Three days after they were married, Maria brought out the bottle and ceremoniously returned it to him, giggling like mad. It was men's cologne, especially recommended for after-shaving. Jean Pierre, all done up in a rose-colored cloud, had been too much in love to notice what he was buying.

They disagree wholeheartedly, but good humoredly, about hats, rouge and jewelry.

“I do not like women to wear hats,” Jean declares. “Their hair is so beautiful —why not display it?”

Maria likes to use rouge. Jean Pierre says no. Maria likes the kind of jewelry you can see coming. Jean Pierre's taste runs to smaller pieces of exquisite workmanship. He has designed many of them himself and done a superb job. That emerald and gold cactus pin, for instance —it would make Mr. Tiffany go green with envy. Emerald green.

“You like it?” Jean Pierre inquired delighted. "It is simple but effective, yes?"

$60,000 glitter . . .

She had a set of matched emeralds which was the pride of her life and which she had bought before she knew Jean. The first time she wore them, he raised a disapproving eyebrow.

"I like them!" Maria asserted defiantly.

"Darling, they are too much. They are in bad taste. Especially in war time."

"Nothing," said Maria positively, "which cost sixty-thousand dollars can be in bad taste. But it is true that this is war time. I will put them away."

There is a note of authority in Jean Pierre's voice which convinces people that he knows what he's talking about. It is especially evident in connection with his profession. During his last stay in New York, he was asked to do a play on a radio program. Of course a lengthy discussion followed as to what play he should do.

"It must have the emotion as well as the drama," Jean said decisively. "And it must be something which moves fast. It must go like this—flic, flic, flic!" He illustrated with quick movements of his hands.

They finally settled on "Hold Back the Dawn," with Jean Pierre playing the Charles Boyer part.

Jean had been in New York for a couple of weeks then, with the fans pursuing him in ever-increasing numbers. So a special detail of police was assigned to cover his radio appearance. Jean Pierre and his press representative set out quite casually for the broadcast. They got within a block of the studio, and Jean, peering out of the taxi, said, "There has been an accident, I think. Or a fire."

"The accident's gonna be to you, chum, when you step out of this cab," the driver said. "Them are autograph hounds, and when they get through grabbing 'souvenirs', you'll be lucky if you've still got your pants."

Now Jean Pierre is a very un-conceited guy for a movie star, and he didn't believe a word of this. So they drove on through the crowd and pulled up in front of the studio and got out. Did you ever go over Niagara Falls in a barrel? What happened to him next was something like that. Big Irish cops tried to rush Jean through the crowd to the door, but it was like pressing against a rubber wall. It would give a little and then bounce right back. It was pandemonium. When they finally got Aumont into the studio, he was almost in shreds. But all he could say was, "They like me! They really like me!"

Before he and Maria left Hollywood for New York, his friends gave him a terrific farewell party. The guests included all Jean and Maria's close friends—Marlene Dietrich, Jean Gabin, the Charles Boyers, the Gene Kellys, Richard Whorf and many more of Hollywood's most platinum plated stars. To make it gay they all put on vaudeville acts, and some were good and some were bad, but they all were funny. Finally it came Jean Pierre's turn.

"There is one thing I've always wanted to do," he announced solemnly. "That is to sing. But no one would ever let me. Tonight is my farewell party, and I am going to sing!" Sing he did, and everyone loved it. Especially Jean Pierre!

The next day he and Maria left for New York. One of the first things they did when they got there was to stage a sentimental reunion at "21"—the scene of their historic meeting where he asked her for a match and their romance began. Gravely they reserved the table Maria had occupied on that occasion. There were flowers, champagne and a general air of honeymoonism. They sat down at the pagne. They looked at each other like Sinatra fans gazing at The Voice.

"To you, my sweet," Jean Pierre murmured in that voice that catches at your heart. He raised his glass.

"To you, darling," Maria echoed, her eyes shining like dark candles.

no time for love . . .

That was when people started coming up to say hello. Dozens of them. Maybe hundreds. In about two minutes that super-romantic rendezvous changed into something about as private as a War Bond rally. It was fun, but you couldn't call it a tête-à-tête.

Fortunately things like that amuse Jean Pierre. Besides, he wanted to show Maria off. "My friends all approved of her," he said proudly. "It could have been so difficult, that, if they did not. But they think she is wonderful."

Maria's friends think Jean is wonderful, too. Wonderful, but mysterious. Because he isn't a man you get to know quickly. You come in the room and there he is, charming, handsome, with that intense, vibrant aliveness that is like a flame. After you have met him a few times, you are completely devoted to him, and yet you don't really know the man at all. There is a core of strength and reserve back of all the charm, and it is that core which makes him different. It gives him tremendous character, and it explains why, with everything he wants here in America, he has gone off to fight for France.

Someone at a Hollywood party asked him once why he was going. "Now, when you're just married and your career is off to such a flying start."

"I do not talk about it well," Jean said gravely. "I can not even explain. I only know what I have to do."

Yes, he has to do it, because that is the way he is made. There are things in the world that one must fight for. Truth and freedom and one's country. If that country is in the hands of the enemy, it is all the more necessary. So Jean put on the uniform of the Free French. He studied like mad those last weeks and took examinations which qualified him to serve as a lieutenant, instead of the sergeant he had been before the fall of France. He was prouder of that lieutenancy than of any laurels his acting career had ever achieved for him. And off he went to join not a huge brilliantly organized army with all the money and power of the United States behind it, but a tiny dogged band of fighters who represent a France that will never die.

Did Maria want to let him go? Look, if you were married to Jean Pierre Aumont, you wouldn't want to let him go away from you for three days, let alone three years, or however long it's going to take us to put Germany in her place. Of course Maria didn't want to. But she did it with a smile, as war brides are doing all over the country.

"The uniform is most becoming," she assured him. "If you had designed it yourself, it could not be better. I am very proud of you, my darling."

The imminent parting made those last days very precious. Jean and Maria were together constantly.

"It has been like a fairy tale," Jean Pierre said. "It will be like that again when I come back."

But because the "coming back" was so uncertain and so distant, they talked a lot about the past. They went over every moment, from their first meeting.

"I had a premonition—before I met you," Maria told him, with a far-away look. "The stars declared that my life, my

CLEARER 'TOP-SKIN'

Here's Easy Way To Deflake Ugly Dried Up Aging Skin Cells To Reveal Glowing Fresh Under-Skin!

A "deflaking" process must constantly take place in your skin if your under-skin beauty is to be revealed in all its youthfully radiant, clear freshness.

This "flaking" off of the old dried up discolored skin cells is practically invisible but VERY IMPORTANT—otherwise your skin may appear faded, sallow, coarse textured and UNLOVELY.

And here's one of the most effective and quickest ways to help hasten this process along—EDNA WALLACE HOPPER'S WHITE CLAY PACK.

Helps You Look Your Dazzling Best On Short Notice

Just spread Hopper's White Clay Pack over your face and throat. It gives you the same massage-like effects of an expensive facial. Wash off when dry (takes only 8 minutes).

Then observe how that tired, weary look vanishes. How much firmer, smoother your skin feels. The mild rubefacient or "blushing" action of Hopper's Clay Pack is what gives the appearance of your skin a finer texture—a youthful bloom—a bewitching radiance that is positively devastating.

Blackheads are easily loosened. Enlarged pore openings temporarily reduced.

Used weekly—Hopper's White Clay Pack helps you maintain a heavenly smooth, clear, radiant "Top-Skin" beauty thruout the years. At all cosmetic counters.

GIVE YOUR FACE AND THROAT THIS 'BEAUTY-LIFT'

Edna Wallace Hopper's Homogenized Facial Cream is a super-lubricating cream which works wonders for face and throat. Always gently press an extra amount of cream over any lines or wrinkles and leave on at least 8 minutes. Use every night. Also makes an excellent powder base.

Some Laxatives are Too Strong-

Forcing a child to take a harsh, bad-tasting laxative is such needless, old-fashioned punishment! A medicine that's too strong will often leave a child feeling worse than before!

emotions, would become involved that night. I thought how could this be? I was going out with an old friend, no one to stir the emotions."

"Then I came along, and you gave the old friend what they call the brush-off," Jean teased her.

"I did not! Never do I give the brush-off to anyone. But I look at you, and I think here he is—the one!"

"You mean you intended marriage, that first time we met?" Jean demanded incredulously.

"Naturally not." Maria was dignified. "I only thought 'I must know this man better.'"

So the next night, when they were to have dinner together, Maria was out to make a really super impression.

"I got out my best jewels, my most dramatic gown. It was gold lamé, and I put on not one stitch under it, so you would notice that my figure was—well, not bad!"

Jean Pierre grinned. "I noticed."

"Ah, Jean, you were so exciting that night! Never in all the world has there been a man as exciting as you were."

"Were!" Jean was indignant. "What is this were? I suppose now I am not exciting! Now I am a bore!"

Maria laughed. "You are still so exciting, my darling, that I do not see how I stand it."

It is easy to tell what she means. Jean Pierre looks like the blond young men you used to see driving long, low-slung roadsters to the Yale-Harvard games. But there is more to it than that. There is an air of sureness, of worldliness, back of that youthful appearance, that is—well, perhaps Maria's word "exciting" is best.

Jean is intelligent. He reads a great deal and even writes a little.

"Just character sketches," he explains, "of our friends. I do them for fun only." But they have a curiously vivid quality which captivates everyone who reads them. Perhaps when the war is over and he comes back to America he will write a novel.

"You must write," Maria tells him positively. "Any man married to me must be a writer."

She writes, herself. Poetry. In Spanish.

"She gets all fixed up, with the typewriter, looking so legal," Jean says delightedly. "I think she must be writing to her lawyer. I say 'Maria, you write something very important?' And she says 'Poetry'!"

"So then I read it to him." Maria's dark eyes gleamed with laughter. "I say 'Darling, give me your opinion.' But of course I do not really want an opinion at all. I just want to be praised."

"I do praise you, Maria! I only say sometimes to use one word instead of another."

speaking the good american . . .

"He is cute," Maria sighed. "But, would you believe it, he thinks he knows American better than I do. Why, he even corrects my accent!" She sounded pretty indignant over this. Maria's Spanish accent is as sliceable as chocolate cake, but she's convinced she's gotten rid of it entirely.

"Certainly I correct your accent," Jean said virtuously. His is French but equally sliceable. "We must speak the good American."

"Can you beat that!" Maria sat up, and her eyes flashed like a couple of Coast Guard beacons. "I speak better than you, Jean Pierre Aumont!"

Jean grinned. "You look like Kiki when you get angry," he observed.

Kiki is a small, a very small kitten. One night Jean was on the way home from a stag dinner tendered him by the studio. He stopped on a quiet side street to let a friend out. Suddenly something jumped into the driver's seat beside him. It was a small, furry thing. It was, in fact, Kiki. Jean looked around helplessly. There wasn't a light in any of the houses. Kiki wandered over onto his knees, dug her paws in comfortably and curled up for the night.

"I take you home to Maria," Jean said at last. "Would you like that?"

Kiki purred like mad. Obviously she thought Maria would be so nice to come home to. Maria loved her on sight, and she is still in the house in California. The day Jean and Maria left for New York, the kitten could not be found. They had to leave without finding her, and they were worried. But they had a telegram on the train, from the housekeeper. Kiki had been hiding down cellar.

"She couldn't bear to say good-by to you, Jean Pierre," Maria declared. "I will not be able to bear it, either."

"We will not say good-by," Jean told her gently. "We will say only 'au revoir.'"

So that is what they did. When Maria had to go back to the Coast, Jean Pierre went to Chicago with her, and there they parted. Later he returned to New York and soon set off for "an unknown destination."

What will Maria do while he's gone? Just what you would do if you were married to a soldier. Work very, very hard, write him every day, act as hostess at canteens. But the canteen work in Maria's case isn't going to involve dancing. Because she and Jean Pierre made a solemn pact. Neither of them would dance with anyone else till they meet again. So if a handsome corporal asks Maria to try a rumba with him, and she turns him down, that's the reason. And if in some far off bistro in Algiers or Morocco, Jean Pierre's friends wonder why he wastes his short leave standing alone at the bar instead of dancing, that's the reason. And some day, some time, these two will dance together again.

sophisticates. (Matthew Duffin, incidentally, is currently a lieutenant in the U. S. Army.)

Don and the Duffins used to try out fancy dance steps together; Don thought they were groovy and told them so, a habit that endears him to theatrical people who are accustomed to friendly disparagement from their co-headliners.

When The Blackouts of 1941, '42, '43, '44 (the show will probably go on forever) was first placed in rehearsal in Hollywood, the Duffins were promptly included in the cast. Don went to the El Capitan Theater to watch tryouts, and Joyce Duffin introduced him to a girl who was also trying out.

The girl appeared to have a beauteous chum with large brown eyes and auburn hair. "Who zat?" Mr. O'Connor, whose attention had been magnetized, whispered furiously.

She was the daughter of the orchestra leader, and she smiled at Don—when they were introduced—in a manner that reminded him of stories about spring breaking over the Yukon River. Her name was Gwen Carter, and she was not theatrical, but still a student at L. A. High. She was 17. And just about the time dazzled Donald was getting up enough courage to ask for a date, Gwen and her girl friend left. Left, furthermore, without Don's getting her telephone number. A crisis, indeed.

The truth was that lovely young Mrs. Smith was losing her husband's love . . . the tragic part was she didn't know why!

He looked through a Los Angeles telephone directory. There were six full columns of Carters. He wondered vaguely how a creature so unique could have so many relatives.

Came now New Year's night, 1943. Attending the same party at which Donald was having his usual wonderful time, was a girl who chanced to mention—in casual conversation—the magical name "Gwen Carter."

"You mean you know her?" queried Donald, hearing the angels sing.

"Wanna make something of it?" kidded the girl.

"Say, I'd really like to have her telephone number."

The girl was true to her club, The Amalgamated Order of Womankind. "I'll have to ask Gwen if it's all right with her before I can give you the number," she demurred.

Don hit on an instant solution. "If she doesn't want to give out her telephone number, ask her if she'll telephone me. I want to ask her to have dinner with me some time soon."

Gwen, when confronted by this bit of news, refused to telephone an utter stranger. But she had seen "Mr. Big" and thought it might be nice to know the guy about whom a good many of her friends were raving. She told her girl friend that it would be all right to give Donald the Carter dial combination.

puddle-jumper de luxe . . .

So Don called one evening. He talked casually about his mother, with whom he lives, and about his niece, Patsy. He explained that he had a car, but that it was strictly non-Doheny Drive. It was a couple of '37 Fords, strung together with bailing wire, binding twine and glue. Would she mind riding in the O'Connor coffee grinder out to Casa d'Amour for an Italian dinner?

It sounded super to Gwen.

After dinner they went to Grauman's Chinese to a movie. Nowadays they can't exactly remember what the picture was, but their general impression is that it was a ten-star effort of genius. It was one of the best pictures ever made, they recall opalescently, despite the fact that their attention was directed more frequently to left and right than it was to the screen.

When the picture was over, Don had to rush Gwen home at a rate of speed short of the ULTIMATE wartime limit by only so much as the length of a crocodile's conscience. Gwen's family is very particular about the hours to be kept by a girl still in high school.

"How about tomorrow night? Dinner and maybe a dance or two?" Don suggested as he rushed Gwen to the door.

"Seven o'clock," agreed Gwen.

They went to Chinatown. They parked the O'Connor-Ford Special on North Broadway between a Cadillac and a Lincoln.

Chinatown is fun. The streets are filled with shopping tourists beating their way through the fragrance of a dozen different types of Oriental incense. A Chinese fortune-teller bangs with a muted mallet on a deep-voiced brass gong and calls out fragments of the future. The mechanical melodies of a juke box cry out their rhythm in controversy with half a dozen second-story orchestras.

Gwen and Don ate French fried shrimps, egg foo yung, almond duck, chicken chow mein and fried rice. They wrote, "Having wonderful time, wish you were here," on several of the colored post cards provided by the restaurant and mailed them to certain local acquaintances. In a carnival mood they returned to the car. Abruptly help wanted—grasshoppers . . .

Don had no jack. Not the kind for which a holdup gets put behind bars, but the kind with which you hold up cars. He figured. He perspired. Finally the owner of the car parked directly behind Don's equipage reappeared from Chinatown and offered the use of his jack. Unfortunately, Don's car was built too near the pavement for the jack to be effective. Don thanked the Samaritan, who drove away.

Another motorist parked in the space, and he too offered the use of a jack. Again, it couldn't be depressed enough. "What I need," moaned Don, "is a pair of good stout grasshoppers with rugged muscles on their hind legs."

Gwen suggested that they take a streetcar to her house, telephone a towing service and so have the car serviced. Through Don's mind flashed the farewell flutter of large denominationed currency doing Immelman turns over the western horizon. "Well . . . let's wait a minute. Maybe I'll think of something."

Enter: three G. I. joes. "In trouble, bub?" they wanted to know.

Don allowed as how he was.

"Stand back," they said, getting the situation well in hand.

Two of them hoisted the car while one removed the wheel, then replaced the flat with the luckily inflated spare. Don tried to thank them. He tried to pay them. He tried to buy them a soda . . . or something. They said, "Aw, skip it, bub."

However, Don secured their names and addresses. Two of them have been shipped out of the district, but one of the Samaritans is still in Southern California. He has visited Don twice on the set . . . it's the beginning of a permanent friendship. That's the way Don is—do him a good turn, and he's your pal forever.

There's another trait of O'Connor's that his girl friends usually discover very early in their dating days with Don: He has a hideous time trying to get anywhere on time. His degree of lateness runs all the way from five minutes (by a miracle) to an hour.

During the third week of their romance, Don had a dinner date with Gwen. He knew, when he passed a drug store on which the electric clock was still functioning, that he was about 15 minutes late. By rapid calculation and a psychic suspicion of lurking speed cops, he came to the conclusion that he was going to be half an hour late. So he decided to squander another five minutes and try to patch up the 35 minutes by guile. He parked, bought a small stuffed panda and was back in gear in the prescribed five minutes.

The sight of the panda completely robbed Gwen of the rebuke she had been rehearsing. "This time, you're forgiven," she said in a mollified tone.

A week later, that same drugstore clock warned Don that he was going to be 45 minutes late. So he bought a Cwazy Wabbit . . . complete with cotton carrot . . . and attached a card around its neck reading, "Larger animal for a longer wait. Sorry."

Then, one night, he arrived with a panda about three feet high. But perhaps we shouldn't go into that. He hasn't been more than a teeny minute or two late since, because Gwen pointed out that her room would scarcely accommodate another animal and that her patience was considerably crowded, too.

A few days later, after having worked steadily for more months than you could cram into a remake of "Lost Horizon," Don finally had a day off. A beautiful, va-was to spend some time in the portrait gallery, talk to his agent, give two interviews and have his car checked from fog light to exhaust.

He hookeyed the works. Yea, he went AWOL. He had been thinking about his free day for a long time, and he had ideas about it. Thoughtfully, he rode to Los Angeles and walked briskly into the establishment of the most famous of West Coast jewelers. "I want to see," he said, swallowing carefully, "an engagement ring."

By no means did he select the first ring he was shown. He looked them over, remembering the shape of Gwen's hands and wondering whether this design would be better . . . or maybe that . . . or the other . . . But, like love, when you see the right one, all doubts vanish. His selection was a fetching number: a large center diamond set in platinum and surrounded by baguette stones.

When he had planned this purchase, Don had always imagined that the actual selection of the ring would represent the big problem. Now, with the square velvet box in his pocket, he realized that the big decision was just coming up over the hill . . . like a truck on the wrong side of the highway when you're driving a pogo stick.

How was he going to present the ring to Gwen? And when? And where?

He wanted it to be something pretty special. A moment to remember forever, although he was too groovy to admit such a sentiment in solid words. He decided to have a coke while thinking it over.

After five cokes he was no nearer a solution so he decided to let the thing work itself out. They were going to the Florentine Gardens that night for dinner and dancing. Somehow, he'd find a way to make the presentation . . . if his excitement didn't catapult him into saying prematurely, "Here, Gwennie, take a gander at the glitter." Oh, fine!

He managed to keep the contents of his pocket a military secret when he called for Gwen—she was looking like a half-pint of heaven—and afterward during the drive to the Florentine. They were shown to their table just a few moments before the lights dimmed down and a spot was turned on the flag. The band went into the opening bars of "The Star-Spangled Banner." Throughout the room, servicemen snapped to rigid attention; somewhere a clear, sweet soprano uttered the pulse-pounding words.

Thinking, "A year from now I'll probably be in the uniform of an aviation cadet," Don reached through the darkness to take Gwen's hand. A small, warm, soft hand that nestled confidently in his own wide paw. Then he had his inspiration. Reaching into his pocket, he extracted the ring and slipped it onto the third finger of Gwen's left hand.

When the lights went on, she glanced inquiringly at Don, then looked down at her hand. "Oh, Don!" she said, lowering her head quickly so that none should see the quick, delighted tears.

blueprint for the future . . .

They left the Florentine rather early that night, drove to Gwen's house and parked in front. They had a lot of talking to do about the future. They couldn't be married, they agreed, for two years. Gwen had to finish high school. Don had to complete his pre-flight studies and get into the Air Corps.

They talked a little bit about the possibility of Gwen having a career. Like most girls, she wouldn't refuse a screen test; neither would she do back flips and forward gainors at the idea of a screen career. As Don put it later to an inquiring friend, "Practically everyone likes the idea of being an actor or an actress, but Gwen thinks that she'd a little rather have a home and children."

They talked about other things, too. A new car, for instance. Don was afraid that his Ford-Ford wasn't quite the buggy in which to take out a girl like Gwen. "You're more the golden coach with six white horses type," he allowed.

"The car doesn't matter—just as long as we're together," she said softly.

dream wagon . . .

It was the right answer, but Don had his own idea. He had seen a super duper, world-beater of an English car in a dealer's window. A Jaguar '38, to be specific. It had a dark blue paint job and scarlet leather pneumatic seats. Right hand drive, squatty fuselage . . . everything.

He had talked about it to his mother so much that she finally said, "Don, you have a birthday next week. Let's buy that whatchamacallit car for you."

His whoop was still dying on the afternoon air when he turned into the dealer's driveway. How much? Satisfactory. Dotted line? Yeah, man. "You may have some trouble getting used to the right hand drive."

"Not me, mister. I've been driving this car in my sleep." And away he went, a bright blue streak with crimson upholstery. He was aimed at the Carter house.

Gwen was awed. She walked around, exclaiming and touching the wealth of chromium with a delicate finger. After a bit she asked tentatively. "What are you going to do with the Ford-Ford? Sell it?"

Don shook his head. "I don't think I'll ever part with it. Sometimes you and I will take a trip in it. Golly, it's too filled with sentiment and memories to sell."

"I'm glad you feel that way about it," Gwen admitted with a happy sigh. "That's what I had hoped you'd say."

Time rolled on. Don finished "Top man," "This Is The Life" and "The Third Glory." Finally, another of those rare free periods catapulted Mr. O'Connor into Maurice's (far-famed custom jeweler) where he had seen a heart-shaped topaz ring.

"For my girl's birthday," he confided.

"Don't you think you should bring the young lady in and let us size the ring?" Maurice suggested.

"Nope. I want to surprise her exactly on her birthday."

Two entire weeks before Gwen's birthday, and he already had possession of her present! It was to smirk!

He stopped at a drive-in, killing time with a turkey sandwich and a malt. She wouldn't be out of school until 2:30, but at 2:10 he was parked outside L. A. High. And he was holding the car door open for her when Gwen descended the stairs. "Hi, beautiful," he said casually.

"What are you grinning about? You're up to something. You can't fool me."

So he had a secret. So it was his affair. He wasn't going to tell her one single thing until The Day. He wasn't going to give her a hint. Nor ask her how she liked heart-shaped rings. Absolutely not.

He still doesn't know how it happened that he flipped the box into Gwen's outstretched palms after shouting, "Here—catch!" Just one of those flukes.

But a guy can't be expected to keep a secret forever, especially when he's kept it for three full hours.

Gwen did receive one surprise for her birthday, however. Her mother had arranged to have an autographed picture of Don framed for Gwen's room. The inscription, in Don's small, careful script, was a long one having to do with the times they've had together, the laughs, the dances, the snacks at drive-ins, the double dates with Peg Ryan and her fiancé, and ended, "I'll be seeing you on the set."

Definitely a love set.

wasn't the point. Yes, she was tired, but what of it? Greer Garson and Kathryn Grayson were going—giving up the chance of seeing their husbands, both scheduled for September furloughs. If you wanted to talk about sacrifice, that was a sacrifice. She was only tired.

They were due to leave the following night, so she had to hustle. Clothes. She'd worn out her own on the camp tour, so M-G-M let her have some of the things she'd used in pictures. FIGHT INFANTILE PARALYSIS

JANUARY 14-31

Love." Iturbi was going, so she took their popular number from "As Thousands Cheer"—"The Joint is Really Jumpin' down at Carnegie Hall." No time to get arrangements. They'd have to be made on the train.

She packed slacks for the train. And books. You could do a lot of reading in 21 days. And pads and pencils, so she and her sister Jimmy and her friend Betty of the publicity department could play word-games. She never found time to open a book, and after the first two days there were no more word-games.

She took the gargle that's her old standby. Always gets you through a show, if your throat threatens to give out. Pretty soon all the girls were using it. Betty Hutton. Kit Grayson. Lucille Ball. They'd come running with their mouths open just before they went on, and Judy'd pour in a generous slug.

Finally, she took bath salts. They're her weakness. She likes her bath to smell real pretty, says Judy. Only trouble was, you couldn't have a bath till you reached the hotel, and she kept leaving her salts on the train. It got to be a running gag. A wail would go up. "I forgot—"

"My bath salts," Jimmy and Betty would chorus.

She bought bath salts in every town they played and brought back a collection to last her six months.

The train was their home. They slept on it every night but one. Diner and two lounge cars—used as rehearsal rooms—were in the center, sleepers at either end. It was definitely not a luxury train. Soot seeped in over the old-fashioned plush and mahogany. Dick Powell showed them how to protect their clothes by hanging them from the baggage rack, sheets fore and aft. Judy, a bug on cleanliness, kept scrubbing out the bathroom—and fifteen minutes later it was dirty again.

The routine reminded her of one-night stands with her sisters in small-time vaudeville long ago. Except that she didn't play to million-dollar houses then, and what the audiences yelled wasn't always so complimentary.

routine en route . . .

Having gone to bed late, they'd get up around 10:30. Judy breakfasted in her compartment, a half hour's peace before the hurly-burly started. Orange juice, French toast and coffee. And she gained five pounds to add to the five she'd gained on her camp tour. For two years she's been trying in vain to put on weight. Dashing madly round the country for eight weeks, she succeeded. Why, nobody knows. Her own sage conclusion is, "Be patriotic and get fat."

At 11:45 they'd gather in the lounge car. Mickey Rooney'd come through, yelling: "Daily Roomer! Get your daily Roomer here!" and hand out slips with the numbers of hotel rooms. At 12 they'd leave the train. Fifteen minutes for the cameramen, then through the milling crowd to the jeeps outside. Each jeep was driven by a soldier and carried a performer's name. Each performer perched himself on the back of his jeep for the two-hour parade up and down the streets of the town.

It was hot in most places, so Judy wore suntan for stockings, kicked off her shoes and rode barefoot. In Boston the crowd got so enthusiastic that they broke through the ropes and yanked her right off the car, bare feet and all! A soldier hoisted her back. They were parading in Washington the day Italy surrendered. The committee car called the news to the car behind, and each car tossed it to the next, till they were all shouting, "Italy surrenders!" and the people on the sidelines were shouting it joyously back.

The only tough part of the parade was smiling. You had to smile. If you stopped, the kids would yell, "Come on, smile for us, Judy." When you smile for two hours, your face starts to hurt. The minute they were alone, they'd all start massaging the ache out of their cheeks.

Around three they were dropped at the hotel. Then, a 45-minute session with the press. Then to their rooms and the highlight of the day—a bath. MPs were stationed outside the rooms to ward off the curious, but telephones remained unguarded. Judy's rang one day as she was running her bath. Up spoke a young voice. "There's a bunch of us down in the lobby from the junior high school. We'd like your autograph."

"I'm afraid I can't manage it right now."

"Oh, Miss Garland, didn't you see 'The Youngest Profession'?—Well, then, you ought to understand."

"I do understand, honey," sighed Judy. "But if I don't take a bath, I'll lose more fans than I'll win."

For some reason, Cagney and Astaire always got the best suite. The girls had it figured out. "These hotel people believe everything they hear about movie actresses. They think we'd start clawing if one of us got a better room than another. So they stick us all into these linen closets, and you boys get the gravy." To even things up, they'd gather in the Cagney-Astaire suite for sandwiches, while Two-Beer Iturbi—as they called him lovingly—played dinner music. Then it was time to pack bags, pile into busses and head for the auditorium.

The show had been put together by Eddie Buzzell. Kay Kyser opened it with a medley of service songs and acted as emcee throughout. Cagney sang and danced and recited a poem about bonds. Dick Powell sang. Harpo Marx donned his red wig—nobody ever recognized him without it—and put on one of his loony chases, with Lucille Ball as victim. Then Lucille sang, Astaire danced and Kathryn Grayson sang. Then Greer Garson made a little speech, topping it with an announcement of the evening's figure and the total bond sale to date.

This came as no surprise to the troupe. The minute they got in, they'd start clamoring, "What's the figure tonight?" If it was only $14,000,000, they'd grumble, "Bad house." Actually, there were no bad houses—only smaller or larger houses. Their quota had been set at half a billion. They more than tripled it. By the time they got home, they'd rolled up a grand total of $1,800,000,000 in bonds.

Garson was followed by Iturbi, who was followed by Henreid. For Henreid, Kay had a special routine. All along the parade line, when the girls caught sight of Warners' romantic threat, the reaction was the same. Out shot their arms and Ooooooo! they'd shriek. Then, "Light a cigarette for me, Paul."

So Kay would say, "Now for the ladies we have—," the band would break into "As Time Goes By" and out would come Paul. Kay lighted two cigarettes and handed him one, and the audience swooned or roared, depending on gender. When the foolery was over, Paul read them a moving letter from a Free French soldier.

Then came Betty Hutton, who knocked herself out so that for ten minutes after every performance she'd sit limp and gasping in the wings while they brought her to with cold-water applications. Judy followed Hutton and, after her encore with Iturbi, introduced Mickey who did his imitations. But people wanted them together. "Where's Judy?" they'd yell to Mickey at the parades. "Where's Mickey?"

they'd yell to Judy. The first audience yelled for "Me and My Gal." Mickey didn't know it, so Judy tried to cue him, taking one line and feeding him the next. It was good for a laugh that night, but hardly what you'd call a professional performance. So in an empty dining room next day they dreamed up a dance to the tune of "How About You?" and the boys faked the music. It was promptly incorporated into the show, for there wasn't an audience that didn't insist on a joint number from the two.

Then the whole company lined up on the stage, and the house lights went on. You'd know there were lots of people out there but, with the spotlight in your face, you couldn't see them. Now suddenly you did—row on row, stretching back and back, farther than your eyes could reach—your fellow-Americans, all there because they believed in what you believed in, all there in a common cause. They rose quietly as the bugles blew, and three service men carried the colors down the aisle. And then, as you all sang "The Star-Spangled Banner" together, came that surge of love and pride in your country, warming your heart, swelling your throat. It was like a bond forged, like a wordless pledge exchanged, welding many into one—it was the evening's high moment, and Judy always felt a pang of regret when it ended, a wish that they could all hang on forever to the feeling it gave them.

In New Orleans they had to forego that triumphant finale. New Orleans was two feet under water, and the rain still coming down strong. They played in raincoats in the open Sugar Bowl, but for safety's sake, the Bowl had to be emptied as quickly as possible. So while Judy and Mickey and Kay did the final number, the others were sneaked into the bus. "We can't do this to them," Betty Hutton wailed. "It's like leaving your best friends on Corregidor."

Back on the train, their midnight dinner would be followed by a social interlude in the lounge. Astaire and Kay Kyser played gin rummy clear across the continent. Over the roar of the wheels, Kathryn Grayson and Judy and Dick Powell sang "Rigoletto," and couldn't talk at all the following morning. Betty Hutton enlarged Kathryn's repertoire by teaching her "Murder! He says." She took pride in her pupil's aptness. "Be sure you tell Louis B. Mayer you know a nice new song."

Once a week they'd hit a town where the girls could have their blouses laundered. Every night they did their own stockings and lingerie, and every night the doctors would go through, calling: "Sleeping pills? Anyone want sleeping pills?" At best, it was hard to sleep on the train and, at worst, impossible. Judy became convinced that the engineer deliberately waited till the middle of the night to do his fanciest jarring. There's one night her pals won't let her forget.

Jolted and banged and tossed like a cockleshell at sea, she finally got mad and stormed out in search of the porter. "What does this train think it's doing anyway? And whatever it's doing, tell it to stop."

From behind Mickey's curtains came a sardonic haha! "You tell it, Garland. Or sing it a lullaby. The porter's got nothing to do with how the train runs."

Poor Judy apologized profusely next morning, and the porter consoled her. "Don't you mind, Miss Garland. In your place, I'd've acted likewise."

cheers for the mick . . .

But there were pleasanter memories: The surprise for Mickey's birthday, when they all filed into the diner and deposited on his table beautifully wrapped gifts from the Five-and-Dime—then sang "Happy Birthday" as the waiter appeared with a big candle-lit cake. Judy vows she's never seen the Mick so close to tears. They lived to regret at least one of their gifts, however. Mickey drove them insane, dropping his fake spider down under their noses.

There was also Harpo and his honking horn. He took particular delight in sneaking up on Greer Garson with it. But in that lady he met his match. She grabbed it one day and batted him over the head with a mighty honk! "That'll teach you that I can play slapstick, too. Or did you think, like so many, that I'm a walking cathedral?"

The boys at Randolph Field didn't think so. Every Wednesday Kay Kyser had to do his regular broadcast, so the Cavalcade show was put on from 7 to 9. On that particular Wednesday Kay was airing his show for the 5000 cadets at the field, and the others went along as his guests. It was very hot, and they were very tired. "No entertaining, remember," the committee had said. "Just tell them hello." But when the boys yelled for Astaire to dance, of course he danced. And when they yelled for Greer to say something, she stood up beside Kay and said:

"Well, boys, you've caught me with my skirts down. I can't sing or dance for you but—you keep 'em flying and we'll keep 'em buying." With which she gave Kay a big kiss, and the boys went wild.

Nor would you have recognized Mrs. Miniver in the Garson who sang a blues trio with Judy and Lucille on the train one night. It was called the Rooney-Pidgeon-Skelton blues, and the girls had whipped it up themselves in a couple of hours, from an idea of Judy's. Gravely they faced their audience, and here's what came out:

All: We're three little maids from Hollywood,
We want to do things we never should.
They never let us have our fling.
We always do the same old thing.
Judy: I'm Mickey Rooney's girl friend.
Greer: I'm Walter Pidgeon's wife.
Lucille: I'm Red Skelton's sidekick.
All: And we're stuck with them for life.
Judy: I sing to Mr. Gable, but he's never really there.
I'm longing to enchant him with sophisticated flair,
But every time I turn around—Andy Hardy's in my hair!
All: There's no escape—you're stuck with that for life.
Greer: I'd love to go cavorting with some charming Mr. Deeds,
And slink around in modern gowns with several well-placed beads.
But all I get is bustles—flannel nighties—widows' weeds!
All: There's no escape—you're stuck with that for life.
Lucille: I'd love to play dramatic roles with diction terse and clipped,
To chew the scenery into shreds with stark and somber script,
But I'm always with Red Skelton, being flipped and tripped and stripped!
All: There's no escape—you're stuck with that for life.
All: What good is versatility,
When we can't show our ability
To do the sort of thing we would enjoy.
Greer: I'm stuck with domesticity
Lucille: And I with burlesquicity
Judy: And I'm so goshdarned busy being coy.
Greer: I'm Garson!
Judy: I'm Garland!
Lucille: I'm Ball!
All: Three girls who are tired of it all.
We can't get away from those three leading men,
We finish up a picture, then we're with them again.
Greer: In aprons!
Lucille: In spangles!
Judy: In socks!
All: Three leopards who can't change their

"Spocks" had been "spots" originally. "But it doesn't rhyme," Judy protested.

"Make it spocks," advised Greer, "and call it poetic license."

With appropriate gestures it brought the house down, and the committee was all for sticking it into the show. Couldn't be done, though. No time to arrange music. They're talking now of building an M-G-M revue around it.

Henreid came in for a lot of kidding. Judy, Jimmy and Betty constituted themselves his razzers-in-chief, called him Paul Henatra, ran up in a body, shooting their arms out and going, "Oooooh!" Gave him whole packs of cigarettes to light at a time. He retaliated by addressing them as the Andrew Sisters and dosing their colds. One or the other was always down with a cold. It wasn't enough for Paul to provide the medicine. He had to stand by till they took it. And if there's anything more unglamorous than a girl in the act of applying a nose spray, these three didn't know what it was.

"You're just trying to get back at us."

"I just don't want you to be sick. Now blow."

Judy did have one glamorous evening, though, in Chicago. It was the one time she wore a formal—because they were playing to 135,000 people at Soldiers Field.

HOW'S YOUR CONSCIENCE?

Does a persistent little voice keep butting into things that are none of its business . . . setting you straight a hundred times a day? Does it keep nudging you to phone your local Red Cross chapter and make a date to give your blood? Bet you slap your conscience right back in place with, "Sure, some day!" Well, that some day's now, right this minute. A guy you know, a beau or maybe a brother, may be praying for that blood—may need it to stay alive. Gonna keep him waiting?

Finding that the train wouldn't pull out till 1, they all went to the Blackstone together for dinner. The orchestra played what is probably Judy's favorite song in the world—"Vienna, City of My Dreams." She started humming it.

"How do you know that song?" asked Paul.

"I have the Tauber record. I always keep sticking my ear down, trying to catch the German words."

So he taught them to her. By that time the orchestra had swung into a medley of Viennese waltzes. "Now that you can sing a Viennese song, maybe you'd like to dance a Viennese dance—"

"I don't know how."

"Just hang on."

star-spangled night . . .

She decided it was more fun than straight dancing—the lovely lilt of the melody, the unexpected turns and reverses, the floaty feeling. They must have been good, too. Everyone cleared the floor to watch and applaud, and in her bouffant silver-blue lace, Judy felt oh! so old-world and continental.

But it was from unromantic Pittsburgh that she brought back the memory which will live with her longest. They'd just sat down to dinner on the train after the show, when Mickey appeared, his face grave and a little strained.

"Look, folks," he said. "I know you're tired and I know your food'll get cold, but there's a trainload of sailors leaving for an embarkation point, and they'd love to see you guys. Would you come?"

The windows of the other train were choked with young faces. As the members of the troupe stepped down, Mickey introduced them. "Here's Kathryn Grayson—here's Jimmy Cagney—" Each time, a welcoming shout went up. Harpo came out last. He'd stopped for his wig—

They walked alongside the cars, talking, shaking hands, signing caps. Astaire did some of his classiest stepping, and Betty Hutton sang "Murder!" with no accompaniment but the chortles of her audience. In the midst of all this, the troop train gave a sudden jerk. It was leaving—

The group on the platform fell silent. Into the hush Dick Powell's tenor broke; "Anchors aweigh, aweigh—" As by one impulse, the others linked arms and joined him, and the gobs picked it up. For a moment they faced each other—home front and fighting front, singing together—then the train pulled out. White caps waved good-by. Over the racket of wheels and engine the old Navy song floated back—fainter and fainter and died away.

For once the diner was quiet that night. No singing, no jokes. For once they broke up right after the meal. What the others did, Judy doesn't know. For herself, she climbed into bed, burrowed her nose in the pillow and cried her heart out.

GOOD NEWS

so bid on it. He thought from the instant accompaniment that his cause was lost. Not to be put off by competition, Mister Carson went into the bidding with teeth, tongue and tenacity. Each time he thought he had triumphed, a small voice from the extreme opposite side of the room overbid him. It was enough to cost a man his last penny. Jack gave up and glowered in the general direction of his apparently millionaire competitor.

The lovely lady who tripped up to the auction block to claim her prize was Mrs. Jack Carson.

Chiller-Diller:

He had been with the Navy during the Guadalcanal landings; his boat, considerably smaller than a cruiser, had been named—because of her trim lines and beautiful performance—"Paulette." So, when Seaman O'Brien appeared at Paramount and asked to meet Miss Goddard, everyone thought it was a great idea.

He spent some time on the set where Paulette was working in a picture ironically titled "I Love a Soldier." As the sailor was leaving, he presented Miss Goddard with a silver ring set with turquoise stones.

"I love Indian jewelry," she enthused. "This is simply lovely. I'll wear it constantly and that's a promise. Did you happen to get it at the Indian House in Albuquerque?"

The sailor pursed his lips. "Well, not exactly. I took it off the finger of a Japanese pilot whom we shot down over Guad. The pilot, by the way, was a girl."

Paulette stared at the ring. "But how on earth did she ever get hold of an obviously American Indian ring?" she wanted to know.

The seaman shrugged. "We saw plenty of mysterious things out there," was the only comment he had to offer.

Mush Brush:

So you think you have troubles! Yet it's safe to wager that you've never gone to the door one evening, dressed in your chiffon formal, with ten yards of frou-frou in your hair, only to be faced by an escort wearing, among other things, a five o'clock shadow thicker than the Australian bush.

It happened to Anne Baxter, and the fur-bearing boy friend was Bill Eythe, camouflaged for his role in "The Eve of St. Mark." Anne said severely, "If you think we're going out to dinner with you looking like a junior G. B. Shaw, you're mistaken. Sit down."

Taking scissors in hand, Anne whipped out a nice Van Dyke for Mr. Eythe. We refrain from telling you what the 20th Century make-up department said the next morning when it had to piece in Bill's beard so that he would match the previous day's shooting.

Foiled:

Very soon now the name William Eythe is going to be a household word in the United States. He would also like to have it written on a hotel register in Mexico City. The fulfillment of this ambition is fraught with pitfalls having to do with our first statement about the chap whose name—for your information—rhymes with blithe.

The moment he finished his work in "Song of Bernadette," he bought an airline ticket to Mexico City, packed his bags and innocently answered the telephone while the taxi was waiting to take him to the airport. An error.

The studio was calling: He mustn't leave town as he had been cast in and must start immediate work on "The Eve of St. Mark."

He finished "Eve" (our apologies to Adam), bought another Good Neighbor ticket and had one foot on the transport steps when he was again summoned to the telephone. To We'll keep you posted when he finishes this picture. Seems the script department has another goodie lined up, whereas Mr. Eythe is seeking to buy an efficient brand of disappearing powder.

Reverential:

This is a simple story about one of the ways in which motion pictures are made. It is about a walled garden in which carefully tended flowers grow in great mounds of color, a garden to which swallows return each spring. It is a story about a gentle, kindly priest who is nearly 73 years old.

The second company, or location group, which is making "Tomorrow's Harvest" for Paramount, had arranged to film a series of scenes in the lovely gardens of Mission San Juan Capistrano. For several years the priests who live at the mission had felt the need for a new chapel. By renting their garden to the studio for a given number of days, they found that they were going to be financially able to build the long-prayed-for chapel.

The picture company arrived one morning, complete with cameras, lights, dollies, microphones and the rest of the diverse paraphernalia of picture making. Having set up, preparatory to shooting, they were unable to unreel even so much as a foot of film because of the heavy overcast. The workmen simply sat in the shelter of the mission arches and waited.

In the afternoon, the priest—puzzled—approached Frank Borzage, the director, and asked why no use was being made of this obviously expensive preparation. When he was told that no footage could be shot until the sun came out, he shook his head. "I didn't understand," he said in a rich, time-steeped voice. "I shall go have a talk with my boss."

The next morning the sun came out, radiant and clear. The work went forward rapidly.

When the priest emerged late in the afternoon, Director Borzage asked reverently, "Do you mind telling me, Father, what you said to the Boss?"

"Not in the least," beamed the priest. "I explained that you were providing our new chapel so you must be fine people. And I asked Him kindly to speed your work as He had so speedily answered our prayers for the chapel."

Quickies:

Did you know that Frank Sinatra is having his teeth prettied? It will cost the studio several thousand dollars, but they feel it will be well worth it. This news should encourage the many high school actors and actresses who write to Hollywood authorities, asking what can be done to gain a dazzling star-trade-mark smile. Answer: See your dentist.

Previous Durante day-makers have all been Ingersoll turnips.

On that particular November afternoon Lou Costello was jubilant. The day before he had visited at Universal Studios to institute plans for his next picture with Bud Abbott. Now he was going to his first broadcast since his recovery from rheumatic fever.

He romped with Lou, Jr.—to be a year old in three days. He told Mrs. Costello, "Just for the fun of it, will you keep Butch up tonight until the broadcast is over? Watch him to see if he recognizes my voice, will you?"

The word came in, frantically, at the broadcasting station. Lou, Jr., had somehow escaped from his playpen and toddled to the swimming pool where he was found by his anguished mother. Physicians spent more than an hour in a vain attempt to save him.

Two hours later Lou went back to the radio station, against his doctor's advice. He would still broadcast into the mysterious sound bands, and perhaps somewhere, a small newcomer to a strange land would be reassured by his father's voice.

FERDINAND THE "WOLF"

you could always talk tennis over a malted afterward.

With Verna, Jim whirled into reverse. Proposed the day they met. Married her three and a half weeks later—

He saw her before he met her. Working in "Forest Rangers" at Paramount, where he'd just signed a contract, he spied a girl in the commissary one day and lost his appetite.

He was lunching with Eddie Bracken. "Don't look now, Eddie—but that girl in the white turban two tables away—know who she is?"

Eddie squinted. "Never saw her before."

Jim kept gazing, so bedazzled that when she looked up and caught him, he just gazed some more. She smiled—a puzzled, tentative little smile—then turned away, leaving him and his mawkish grin hung in mid-air.

cooked goose . . .

Abandoning food and Eddie, he took up his stand at the cashier's desk. She'd have to pass right by him. She did pass right by him, practically tripped on his foot. His mouth opened, and his vocal cords froze. You couldn't talk to a vision—not to this lovely, cool vision who certainly knew he wasn't standing there for his health, and who sailed straight past him—straight out of his life.

"Speak to her?" asked Eddie.

"No, I'm too sweet a guy."

"What's that got to do with it?"

"Lord knows," snapped Jim.

A week later he went to dinner with Cereatha and Jack Beutel. They were moving the following day, and he'd offered to help.

"Verna's coming, too," Cereatha said.

"Who's Verna?"

"Verna Knopf. Friend of mine. She's a model. Likes to wear turbans. Had a white one on in the Paramount commissary last week—" She eyed Jim sweetly while he choked on his soup. "She'd love to meet you, Jim—"

"Sez you!"

"Sez she."

The minute Verna walked in next day, he knew he was sunk. Tactful Cereatha sent them to straighten out the kitchen. Working with the speed of panic, lest she get away from him again, Jim kicked his inhibitions in the teeth, and before they left the kitchen, he'd wound up a breakneck courtship with the suggestion, "Why don't we get married, huh?" Verna laughed.

But within a month they'd acted on the suggestion. It was to have been a secret till "Forest Rangers" came out, only Jim couldn't hold it. One night they went to a party at John Payne's beach house. After Jim had confided the secret to half a dozen ears, he decided this was silly, planted himself on the hearth rug and announced, "Flash! Beautiful model marries tennis punk at Las Vegas tomorrow. Those who wish to kiss the groom, form line to the right."

He's unique in that he came to Hollywood with no thought of the movies. He was Lefty Brown, whose southpaw wielding of a tennis racket had earned him his nickname, various championships and the right to represent his alma mater in the Pacific Southwest Tournament. Tennis was his life—tennis and a few people—Mom and his sister Ruth and his brother Bill and Jodie Adams, his sidekick—parents were divorced, and Mom kept them together on the 12 bucks a week she earned in a beauty shop, coming home at night to do the cooking and housework. Ruth was old enough to help, and did. Jim wanted to, but the flesh was weak. He sold "Libertys" till he showed a 15¢ profit—ten for a cowboy movie, five for the latest issue of "G-8 and his Battle Aces."

At 14 he discovered tennis and worked out a club membership by chopping down weeds and stringing rackets. He also discovered Jodie Adams and the uses of bribery. "I'll buy you a sandwich and coke if you'll play with me—" They were allowed to use the courts when it rained. Soon they were hitch-hiking to tournaments, with Mom digging into her meager funds for chow-dough.

School didn't mean a thing. Summers were dedicated to tennis, winters to hookey. Till one day Jim woke up to find all his pals graduated and himself sitting like a six-foot ox among calves. By now he'd won the Texas high school doubles and the State Municipal men's singles. So he wrote to a military school in a nearby town. Boiled down, his letter said, "How's about an exchange? You give me a scholarship, and I'll play tennis for you." They said okay.

While there, he undertook an experiment with his brains. Not the first year. Too busy fooling around the first year. Passed by the skin of his teeth and got really scared. Didn't mind poor grades so much, who cared about grades? But suppose he was dumb or something! Better find out. Buckling down, Mr. Brown missed the honor roll by one lousy point. That was all he wanted to know. Back went the books into mothballs. Out came the rackets and the big bass horn. He played and sang with the school band, and his baritone seemed to please the gals. "Why don't you act the way you sing, honey? You know. Mastuhful."

From Schreiner he moved to Baylor University on another scholarship. Which—after a year of the so-called scholastic life—took him to the summer of 1940 and the tournament in Los Angeles. He'd never thought much about what he was going to be—salesman, maybe, for some sporting goods house, touring the country on an expense account. When his picture was taken with a bunch of movie celebrities and plastered over the front page of a local sheet, he thought it was funny. When a guy came up and said, "Are you interested in pictures?" he said, "Sure, got a pin-up of Grable's legs?"

The guy handed him a card. Henry Willson. Zeppo Marx Agency. "The question still goes," Henry Willson said pleasantly. "Are you interested in pictures?"

"I don't know—I suppose so—" He took refuge in indignation. "Say, who isn't?"

Willson took him over to see Zeppo Marx—to let Zeppo see him, rather. Zeppo thought he'd do. Jim got all excited over seeing a Marx brother, but decided he'd better go back to school. They were counting on him to play in the Southwest Conference, and he couldn't let dear old Baylor down. Thanks just the same, he'd mull things over. Come back next year maybe.

If he hadn't needed an operation, he might have won the singles in the Southwest Conference. If he'd won the singles, he might have stuck to school and tennis. The doctors told him not to play. He played anyway, won the doubles, lost the singles and says his physical condition had nothing to do with it—he just didn't play right. Whatever the reason, he quit, had his operation, got a job in a planing mill, saved enough for train fare and a little over, collected Jodie Adams who wanted to work in an airplane plant and kissed his folks good-by.

slim pickings . . .

Jim was Henry's baby, and Henry was stuck with him. Nobody else cared—least of all, casting directors. They looked, and the way they didn't leap was unanimous. Jodie had no job either, this being pre-Pearl Harbor. They lived in an attic, against whose beams Jim cracked his head every time he stood up. They ate crackers and peanut butter three times a day. Their downhill living standard was marked by three mileposts: when Jim hocked his other suit—sold his two spare tires—wired Mom collect for ten bucks to buy more crackers and peanut butter.

Keeping his ear to the ground, he snagged a rumor that Garwood Van needed a singer. Jim presented himself, crossed his fingers, called up the memory of "You-know-mastuhful," and sang.

The bandleader was cautious. "I've already got a girl. I couldn't afford to give you much—"

"I'm not used to living on much."

He was signed at 25 per. They were to leave on a tour the following Wednesday. Henry called up. "How do you look in a uniform?"

"Like a guy in a uniform."

"Paramount's casting for 'Forest Rangers.' Might as well go over."

At Paramount, for the first time, a casting director eyed Jim as if he were something the cat hadn't dragged in, gave him a script, said they'd test him Monday. Saturday Henry coached him. Sunday he chewed nails. Monday they tested him. Tuesday Henry phoned.

"Hi, Jim, hahya doin?—Packed yet?—Well, listen, be sure you come back when that band circus gets through with you. Paramount? Haven't heard a thing—"

Every half hour Henry called. Every time the phone rang, Jim's heart did calisthenics. When it rang again at noon, he got there first. "Hahya, Hank? I'm fine. I'm packed. I'm clearin' out of here, now, so I don't have to listen—"

"Okay. Be sure you come back, though. Oh. By the way. You're a movie actor."

"Look, brother, you can kick a gag around just so long—".

"Gag, my foot! Meet me at Paramount at four. We're signing the contracts."

staked to steaks . . .

At five Jim and Jodie were dumping cracker-and-peanut-butter remnants into a garbage can. At five they were cooking steak, frying potatoes, opening cans of pork and beans. At seven thirty, when night rates went into effect, Jim was calling Waco—

"Just signed with Paramount, Mom. Talk as long as you like. This one's on me."

She couldn't talk much, she was too busy crying.

After "Forest Rangers," Jim was scheduled for "Wake Island" but, for reasons unknown, got no further than his G.I. haircut. The haircut was all he needed.

Letter to a P.O.W.

WILL YOU WRITE a letter to a Prisoner of War . . . tonight?

Perhaps he was left behind when Bataan fell. Perhaps he had to bail out over Germany. Anyway, he's an American, and he hasn't had a letter in a long, long time.

And when you sit down to write, tell him why you didn't buy your share of War Bonds last pay day—if you didn't.

"Dear Joe," you might say, "the old topcoat was getting kind of threadbare, so I . . ."

No, cross it out. Joe might not understand about the topcoat, especially if he's shivering in a damp Japanese cell.

Let's try again. "Dear Joe, I've been working pretty hard and haven't had a vacation in over a year, so . . ."

Better cross that out, too. They don't ever get vacations where Joe's staying.

Well, what are you waiting for? Go ahead, write the letter to Joe. Try to write it, anyhow.

But mister, or madam, or miss, if somehow you find you can't finish that letter, will you, at least, do this for Joe? Will you up the amount of money you're putting into your Payroll Savings Plan—so that you'll be buying your share of War Bonds from here on in? And will you—for Joe's sake—start doing it right away?

DON'T LET DOWN NOW—

BUY MORE WAR BONDS

"Tex," snapped Henry. "Air Force"! and dragged Jim over to Warners', where 50 guys were being tested for the part. Jim tested, too, then lit out for Chicago, where Verna was visiting her folks. From Chicago they traipsed down to Waco to visit his. Henry nailed him at Waco.

"It's in the bag. Moreover, you're hot stuff. Warners' want to buy you. Paramount won't sell you. Come on home."

"Corvettes" cured him of going to previews. It's not the preview he minds, it's autographs. At "Corvettes" the kids penned him in, and he signed, sweating. Till he caught sight of Howard Hawks. His admirers never knew what happened. One minute he was there, next minute he wasn't!

Home for the time being is a furnished house in the valley, enlivened by Beverly Jean—one in December—and Murgie the sheep dog, short for Murgatroyd. Murgie was Verna's baby for so long that he didn't take kindly at first to Beverly. Now he lets her ride him. As a horse, she prefers her father. She can't get as good a grip on his hair, but he's steadier.

She reminds Jim of his brother Donnie—not through physical resemblance but because he feels for her the same kind of tenderness. Donnie was seven and could scale fences Jim balked at. One night he sat in Mom's lap while she read him the funnies. "When I grow up," promised Donnie, "I'll read you the funnies. And I'll make a million dollars and you can have it all." They were his last words before he died. Because they lost Donnie, he loves his own baby more.

And because he wishes he'd helped Mom more round the house, he now helps Verna. Gets up with the baby at seven when he's not working, so Verna can sleep. Beverly likes to be dressed, standing up. "It can't be done," Jim tells her. "Not with diapers." She snuggles into his neck and ogles him. So he diapers her standing up. Does the marketing, too. Knows his ration points by heart.

Hates night clubs and dancing. His idea of a good evening starts with Swiss steak and string beans and the radio tuned in to Crosby or Hope. Later they'll sit by the fireplace, reading or listening to records. Friends drop in—non-professional mostly except for Alexis Smith and Craig Stevens. Jim's talk is punctuated by, "When Jodie gets back—" Jodie's in North Africa for Lockheed.

bi-annual binge . . .

They're saving War Bonds for the future of the world and the Browns. Handy with the needle, Verna makes all the baby's clothes and some of her own. When they step out, it's for spaghetti and meatballs at the Derby. Their principal splurge is on birthday gifts for each other. Even then, it's a modest splurge. Verna bought Jim a sports shirt which he said looked more expensive than any sports shirt had a right to be. He bought her a bottle of "Danger." Went around sniffing till he sniffed a smell that made him feel romantic.

They're saving to buy their own home after the war. Jim wants a tennis court. And he wants to make things easier for Mom. Mom thinks she's sitting pretty, with a beauty shop of her own and business doubling every time Jim's name hits the paper. (A perforated eardrum kept him out of the service.)

Despite his healthy spot on the road to stardom, he remains slightly dazed by the turn of events. Verna caught him the other day in a fit of abstraction—

"What's wrong, honey?"

He came to with a start. "Seems I'm a movie actor."

"It's an idea some people have."

"Yeah—. Oh well, let's not be narrow about it. I get some funny ideas myself—."

LADDIE COMES HOME

at Alan. "Why don't you shed those khakis?" he demanded.

Instead of speaking the words as a question, however, he used an intonation that told clearly how well he understood the reason Laddie hadn't changed his clothes.

Alan glanced down at the G. I.'s and grinned wryly. "I used to think that the day I put on civvies again would be the happiest day of my life," he admitted. "It just shows how wrong a guy can be. I'm downright crazy about these khakis."

The first guest said suddenly, "Actually, I never did mind reveille very much. It made me feel good to get up in the morning. The air was so crisp."

"To be honest," the second guest admitted slowly, "I had a friend who was an M. P. Swell fellow. Guess I'll miss him."

And the third guest re-crossed his legs, lit a fresh cigarette and confided, "I'm going to get my old job back in an aircraft plant so I won't really be getting any fancy togs. I'll be living in coveralls, which aren't so far from Army fatigue clothes."

The quartet smoked in nostalgic silence for several moments. Sue said, "What you're trying to say, the four of you, is that you hate the idea of being out of the Army."

They exchanged sheepish glances. "When you're in the Army," one of them confessed, "all you talk about is the time when you'll be out."

sad ladd . . .

Alan clarified the idea. "But when you talk about being out, you always take it for granted that the war will be over when you're honorably discharged. A guy never imagines he'll be out while other fellows are still serving."

One of the dischargees shook his head. "In this man's Army, he doesn't get asked about his attitude toward his own ailments. Gosh, if I had known I was going to be let out I would have raised heck—not that it would have done any good."

It wouldn't have done any good, as everyone knows. The Army acts in wonderful and mysterious ways as any K. P. will gladly tell you. What it can use to prosecute the war effort, it takes; what it feels will be of more constructive use in civilian life, it returns to mufti, often to the intense annoyance of the man involved. It is that way with Alan Ladd. It never occurred to him that he would be out of the Army until the unconditional surrender of the Axis was announced. But he has a tricky stomach, the result of living—during those hard early years—on hope and candy bars, day-old doughnuts and coffee, and it violently resented C rations and other G. I. special menus.

Alan's let-down feeling that first night at home was the forerunner of several million similar sensations to be spread over this entire country as rapidly as men are mustered out of uniform.

"I'm going to miss the bull sessions with the guys every night," Alan went on. "I'm going to miss the friendship, the discipline, the team feeling of accomplishing something big and important. And what in the world will ever compare to the thrill of getting a three day pass . . . or answering mail call . . . or getting your first stripe . . ." He glanced around the room, meeting Sue's eyes.

That surge of gladness that belongs to homecoming suddenly answered his question, as it will answer the same question for millions of other men. He was once again in his own house, within sight and sound of those he loved.

The nurse came to the head of the stairway at that moment to call softly, "Alana's awake, Mr. Ladd."

Ascending the stairs two at a time, he arrived breathlessly in the nursery, bounded over and picked up the pink young lady cooing over the prospect of her evening bottle. He cuddled the warm bundle and kissed her cheek.

Ordinarily such attention would be welcomed by almost any babe in the world—age not being a consideration—but Miss Ladd was startled. Moreover she had become accustomed to the treble tones of womankind, and this deep baritone creature was decidedly strange. She let out a whoop that brought the Bill Bendix family, who live across the street, to their upstairs windows with apprehensive questions about how far Alana had fallen.

Combining great haste with great care, Alan returned his daughter to her trundle bed. "I didn't hurt her," he told the nurse defensively.

"Naturally you didn't," the nurse said by way of comfort. "It's just that she's a little temperamental and hungry tonight. Give the young lady a little time, sir."

Alan stuck around during Alana's feeding. When the bottle was empty, he leaned over to see whether he had become a family member in good standing. Miss Ladd puckered her face in excellent imitation of a green persimmon-eater, so her pa exited downstage right, exceedingly nonplused.

"You'll see—she'll get used to you shortly," the nurse called consolingly.

The next morning, after the Ladds had driven their overnight guests to the station, Sue surprised Alan emerging from the nursery on tiptoe. She raised her eyebrows inquiringly.

"She didn't cry," Alan announced in victor's tones. "Of course I didn't try t pick her up. I just stood and looked a her." He added, in the interest of star truth, "She was still asleep."

The situation worried the returned soldier considerably; his general attitud was that Alana was clearly guilty o sabotage against civilian morale. Ten o 12 times each day he slipped into he room to see how she regarded him. Usually her large eyes studied him with neither encouragement nor malice. Once she made a few interesting remarks in a language beyond Alan's ken. As long as he kept his distance, the little lady was polite; the instant he tried to pick her up, she issued an ultimatum in a ringing soprano and a gush of tears.

Knowing the weakness of womankind, Alan went shopping. He searched high and low for a stroller—one that a junior citizen can propel by kicking, or that a patient relative can trundle at the end of a long handle. He finally found a victory model with wooden wheels.

One sunny morning Laddie had the nurse place Miss Ladd in the stroller, then he took her for a ride. Sue watched the performance from an upstairs window. First Alana waved good-by to the nurse; then, espying her mother, she waved a prolonged good-by toward the roof. Then she turned around and stared squarely into the nervous eyes of the gentleman who was pushing her stroller down the street.

glad ladd . . .

"Here we go again," Alan said under his breath.

She tipped her head to one side and allowed her lips to part in a flirtatious grin. She played patacake to indicate a high degree of good nature and a general approval of the morning. Obviously her state of health was excellent, and she was pleased by her companion and the trip they were taking.

When somewhat later they returned to the house, she let Alan lift her out of the stroller and carry her upstairs. "Do you remember how to give kisses?" he asked, testing his luck to the last.

Alana giggled and leaned forward to lick his cheek, puppy dog fashion, an antic which is her highest form of praise.

Laddie left the young lady in care of her nurse and went in search of Sue. Beaming, he said, "Our daughter has just announced officially that I'm once more a member of the family. Guess I can stick around now."

Sue said fine, that it was about time, and that, incidentally, if he would look on the bed he would find a welcome-home gift from Alana's mother.

It was a gift with a history. For Christmas, 1942, Sue had given Laddie (among other things) a beautiful shooting jacket of burgundy suede and vicuña, which is a South American import and the finest of all woolens. His first reaction had been intense pleasure; his second had been dismay as he realized Sue did not yet know of his acceptance by the Army.

"Since I'm going into the Army in a few weeks, it would be silly for me to keep this," he had pointed out. "A beautiful garment like this should belong to somebody who can enjoy it. What good would it ever do me? It would just hang in the closet for two or three years and probably furnish Sunday dinners for the more enterprising moths. Thanks a million, Susie, but you'd better return it."

So she did, with more regret than you could find in a dipper of tears.

woes, en route . . .

And, the instant she knew Alan was being honorably discharged from the Army, she hurried down to the shop from which the jacket was originally purchased and asked an important question. Yes, the jacket was still there.

Alan had given away a good many items of his civilian clothing, but those that he had kept had to be altered because of the weight he lost during his stay in an Army hospital. Incidentally, he needs to before he starts work at Paramount as the young doctor in Rachel Field's great story, "And Now Tomorrow."

There were times during Alan's Army career, of course, when his slenderness was a great boon. Take, for instance, the circumstances surrounding his fall furlough.

He had been stationed at Walla Walla, Washington. Sue had tearfully left Alana in Hollywood with the nurse who had cared for her since birth, and had taken a small apartment in Walla Walla so that she could see Laddie whenever he could get a week-end pass.

When his 14-day furlough was granted, he and Sue decided instantly to return to Hollywood. They rushed to the station, only to find that ONE upper berth was the only accommodation available for days. They took it. As a gag they flipped a coin to see which one would occupy the little hammock and which would get the berth.

The next morning they viewed Portland, Oregon, through eyes glassy for lack of proper rest. "We'll go to a hotel, get cleaned up, catch 40 winks, then have breakfast and see about getting reservations out of here tonight," Alan suggested.

A sterling idea. The only trouble being that, as numerous haughty hotel clerks explained it, "there is a war going on." The hotels were filled to the rafters with traveling servicemen, government employees of one sort or another, defense workers, defense contractors, etc. etc. etc.

Just as Sue was ready to sleep on the nearest lobby lounge, an apologetic manager hastened up to assure the Ladds that he had a room for them. He was sorry to have kept them waiting, and he hoped they would be comfortable for a few hours, at least. It seems that an alert bell captain had spotted the dejected Ladds, recognized them and had notified the manager. He, in turn, loaned them a room that had been reserved by a foresighted traveler who wasn't due until late afternoon.

lather lassies . . .

He proceeded to the barber shop, which happened to be staffed with lather lassies instead of the usual male quartet. Being broadminded about such things, Alan settled himself in the chair and ordered the classic once-over lightly. The suds were applied with a gentle feminine touch, and Laddie was relaxing nicely when he caught sight of the straight-edge razor. It was quivering. It was vibrating. It was shuddering. It was cutting tiny sawteeth in the air.

close shave . . .

"Look . . . er . . . I'm not the first guy you've ever shaved, am I?" queried the gentleman from Hollywood.

The lady barber shook her head. "B-b-b-but you're the f-f-first actor I've ever shaved," she said.

"We're made out of that same old human stuff," Laddie said reassuringly. "When cut, we bleed."

"Oh, I w-w-won't cut you," she promised.

And she kept her word. The razor, held aloft, was about as steady as a hat in a hurricane, but once the blade descended to an apprehensive face, it glided along without wobble, scrape or scratch.

When Alan rejoined Sue in the room he said fervently, "I'm certainly glad that girl wasn't a critic at heart. I was in no position to escape a cutting remark."

That night the Ladds took another upper berth from Portland to Los Angeles (two nights). They spent a hurried eight days at home.

On his return from furlough the Army ordered Alan into the hospital, from where he was honorably discharged.

There's not much satisfaction for Alan, but Sue's brown eyes are dark with happiness at being able to have him home for awhile.

And Miss Alana, now that she has grown accustomed to that newcomer with the blond hair, the green eyes, the deep voice and the affectionate manner, has generously decided to accept his attentions with a gurgle and to kiss him good night every night.

Laddie's home.

THE MIRACLE OF MORGAN'S CREEK

PRODUCTION

girl, wardrobe girl, sound men, film editor and art director. The actors got a break. They didn't have to leave until 7:30. But only because that extra half-hour was necessary to get into make-up and costumes. They had to grope their way to the studio through the half-light of dawn just as early as anyone else.

At the location spot, folks froze and sweltered by turns. When they arrived in the morning, frost was settled on everything. Actors, technicians huddled around salamanders filled with hot coals. Eddie Bracken rushed up to one shivering group and announced, "Know those hens back there in a crate for atmosphere? One of them just laid a frozen egg!" And so did the gag, cause they all felt like icicles.

By noon, the sun was knocking itself out, beaming down, changing the type of discomfort from chattering teeth to overheated foreheads. Betty Hutton kept close to the iced drinking water. Sturges, ever serene, took no notice of the temperature switches. He was too engrossed with such problems as how to keep the acorns from surrounding oak trees from beating a tattoo on the sound track during scenes with dialogue. The final solution for that covering the roof. And just to prove Hollywood's reputation for ingenuity, as soon as the noise-deadening blankets had caught up a generous supply of oak tree fruit, it was converted via grinding into a substitute for coffee.

Brian Donlevy and Akim Tamiroff made only short appearances in the film—sort of a guest shot as a favor to Sturges who gave them such good roles in "The Great McGinty." Neither Brian nor Akim wanted credit, because their roles are so small, but Sturges added a tiny card to the picture's billing reading: "McGinty and the Boss."

The "miracle" of the picture was withheld from everyone in the film until it came time to shoot the actual scene. Folks used to sidle up to the script department and in a hoarse whisper inquire if Sequence L was ready yet. The situation got to be pretty tense. Everyone knew the picture ended happily, but scene 16, the "miracle" scene, remained a mystery until the very last afternoon of shooting!

This debuts Betty Hutton as a dramatic actress, and the studio is anxiously awaiting the fans' reaction. If they like her serious emoting, her future Paramount

IT HAPPENED TOMORROW

In the "morgue" of a metropolitan newspaper of the 1890's, an old man and a young one are having an argument. "Time is an illusion," old Pop Benson declares. Pop has been in charge of the "morgue" of the "Evening News" for many years, and he's seen a lot of todays turn into yesterdays. "What difference does it make whether a thing happened last year or will happen tomorrow?" he asks young Larry Stevens (Dick Powell).

Larry thinks it makes a lot of difference. "If I knew something that was going to happen tomorrow, I could write a story on it and make old man Gordon give me a raise." But of course, no one knows what is going to happen tomorrow, so Larry says good night and leaves for an evening out on the town. He ends up in a night spot where a clairvoyant act is in progress. Professor Cigolini (Jack Oakie) has an extremely pretty assistant, Sylvia (Linda Darnell). She is supposedly in a trance, but Larry catches her glancing his way, and he waits for her after the show. He and Sylvia escape the eagle eye of the professor, who is her uncle, and Larry takes her home in a hansom cab. After some Victorian coyness, she even agrees to have lunch with him the next day, and he starts home through the foggy night, up to his ears in dreams.

On the way he meets Pop Benson, curiously wraith-like in the fog. (Continued on page 10)

When newsman Larry Stevens (Dick Powell) goes to see clairvoyant Professor Cigolini (J. Oakie), he falls in love with his assistant Sylvia (Linda Darnell).

That night a wraith-like figure hands him a newspaper with "tomorrow's headlines." Story of opera house hold-up comes true when he takes Sylvia to opera next afternoon!

When he inserts already-written story in paper, police accuse him of being an accomplice. A second phantom news story saves his hide by disclosing robber's roost! A third headline forecasts his death.

"I'm sure most people would have thought him an ugly man...but when his lips caressed my hair...his fingers touched my throat... I knew he was the most thrilling man a woman ever loved!"

MOVIE REVIEWS

Pop silently hands him a folded newspaper. Larry sticks it in his pocket and forgets it till the next morning. Then he discovers it is the "Evening News" dated that day. Obviously something is wrong. The "News" doesn't come out till afternoon. Larry scans it perplexedly and reads the story of a holdup at the Opera House that afternoon at two o'clock. To his incredulous amazement, the story has his own by-line. He still can't understand it, but when he gets to the office, he surreptitiously copies the story and sticks it in a drawer of his desk. Just in case. . . .

He takes Sylvia to lunch and afterward to the Opera House to hear Melba sing. But the performance is stopped by a holdup. It has really happened. Larry dashes back to the office and hands in the already written story. As a result, he is promptly arrested. The police figure that if he knew about the robbery ahead of time he must have been in on it. Sylvia tries to rescue him by saying that she is really clairvoyant and saw what was going to happen and told Larry.

Cops are a skeptical bunch. "Okay, sister, let's see you do it again," is their proposition. Sylvia figures out an angle to take care of that, but it involves jumping off a bridge into the river, which is taking care of it the hard way. Meanwhile, Pop Benson comes to the jail and hands Larry another "tomorrow's paper." Larry sees with pleasure that the bandits are captured the next morning, and he takes the police to the right place at the right time. Result: The bandits are captured, and Larry is released and given a raise. He and Sylvia drift around in a rose-colored cloud.

But Professor Cigolini suspects that Larry's intentions are not honorable. He demands that he marry Sylvia at once or never see her again. That's fine with Larry, he was just getting around to proposing anyway. At least it's fine until Pop Benson shows up with another paper that says, "Larry Stevens, reporter, killed in St. George hotel robbery." When Larry reads that he rushes off to a hospital and refuses to leave for any purpose whatever, even to marry the luscious Sylvia. He's going to stay right there in a nice safe bed and let someone else get shot in the hotel St. George.

He can't escape fate, even by taking to bed and letting someone else get shot in the St. George at the appointed hour, in spite of all his struggles. The outcome and the explanation are completely unexpected.

Hollywood seems to be going in for fantasy these days. This particular dish of it is handled lightly and is still boy-meets-girl, even if it's hopped up with what-happens-tomorrow. You'll find it bright entertainment with Jack Oakie contributing the comedy high spots.—U. A.

P. S.

Linda Darnell, Dick Powell, Jack Oakie, Rene Clair and the casting director all celebrated birthdays while this was in production. . . . Biggest party was given for Linda. Publicity department called Hollywood U.S.O. and asked for servicemen who were celebrating birthdays to be sent over to join the fun. First to arrive was Private George Bruce of Cincinnati who had just turned 20. Linda shared her gifts and half her cake with the private. Altogether 18 soldiers, sailors and Marines showed up to join the fun. . . . Linda ages from 18 to 80 in this picture. During the last 20 years make-up men had to apply a rubber clay to her face to form wrinkles and extra chins. Stuff usually works perfectly, but Linda's skin was so firm and fine-pored, they had to work with her for 52 hours (at different sittings) to find a strong enough solution to use on her face. . . . Took make-up department two hours to fix her face every morning. On day of her big scene as Dick's wife on their Golden Wedding Anniversary, she tripped at the top of the staircase as they were descending. Dick caught her in time to avoid a serious accident, but when she was back on her feet, both chins were dangling from her right ear, and the cast had to wait another two hours while she was redone. . . . Powell, who has been fighting for years to get away from musicals, can't stop singing between takes. Answered requests from the cast and crew every morning while waiting for day's shooting to get under way. . . . Only song he does in this is one done in a bar in a tipsy condition. Script called for him to sing off key, but he found it impossible so technicians dubbed in a voice for Powell's. . . . Wedlock and Snyder, who wrote the script, have written radio script for both Oakie and Dick in the past.

UP IN ARMS

There isn't anyone like Danny Kaye. For years Hollywood has gotten along with ersatz products, but now here is the real Danny. He's wacky, he's hilarious, he's wonderful! Playing opposite him is lovely Dinah Shore. Constance Dowling and Dana Andrews make up the rest of a fast foursome.

Danny plays a lad named Danny, which simplifies everything. He's an elevator operator by profession and a hypochondriac by avocation. He spends half his time taking vari-colored pills and his temperature, and the other half mooning at a beautiful nurse named Mary (Constance Dowling). Danny has a pal, Joe (Dana Andrews), and he's very happy that Joe and Mary get on so well together. It never occurs to him that it might come up love.

One day Danny gets a letter which begins, "Greetings from the President." Danny is incredulous. They can't draft him! Why, he's half dead now from a dozen different ailments. But "sound as a nut," says the Army doctor, coining a phrase, and Danny's in! So is Joe, who hates to leave Mary as much as Danny does. More. Danny's too busy worrying about his health. He predicts gloomily that six weeks in the Army will finish him off.

Somehow it doesn't. He's known to his barrack mates as "the guy with the pills" and "the noivous joik," but he survives. Mary joins the Army as a nurse and introduces Danny to another nurse, Virginia (Dinah Shore). She hopes he'll fall for Virginia, so that Joe won't be so reluctant to pay her some attention. Joe doesn't want to take Danny's girl. But Danny stays stubbornly in love with Mary. He talks her into coming down to see him off when they start overseas, and with his customary talent for doing the wrong thing, gets her on board the boat by mistake, and she's carried off when they sail. Virginia is on board, too, with a couple of hundred other nurses, and Danny shoves Mary in with them and hopes for the best. The best doesn't materialize, and by the time they get to their destination, Danny is assigned to the guardhouse. Of course, by the end of the picture, he's a hero. But hero or not, he's wacky, he's hilarious, he's

P. S.

For Danny Kaye's debut in motion pictures, boss Sam Goldwyn unsnapped the rubber band around the company's bankroll, gave the picture top rank production values. . . . The three Kaye specialties featured in the film are the work of his wife, Sylvia Fine and Max Liebman. Kaye's favorite is "Melody in 4F." . . . Dinah Shore gets two new numbers to sing, "Now I Know" and "Tess' Torch Song" by Harold Arlen and Ted Koehler. . . . For weeks before production, studio casting director Bob McIntyre and his associates did nothing but look at beautiful girls, trying to decide which 34 would look best to the Technicolor cameras. Mr. Goldwyn himself made the final selection. . . . Biggest sets were constructed for the dream sequences. Kaye dreams he's in a drugstore about the size of the Pasadena Rose Bowl, which turns into a fog-filled jungle with the Goldwyn Girls perched in the tree branches (nice dreaming!) . . . Each one of the trees, incidentally, was air-conditioned and steam-heated at the same time. . . . The steam threw a pretty plume above each girl's head; the air blast kept her cool. 5000 feet of tubing beneath the floor of the sound stage was necessary to accomplish the unusual feat. . . . No harsh, clashing colors in this film. The designers blended colors and made pastels dominate. The tints are correlated in costumes, sets, furniture, drapes, hardware and even the hair of the actors. . . . Made it possible for the picture to move from a beige waiting room to an entirely different color set-up without ruining the audience's color sensitivity. . . . Most unusual expert hired for the picture was Dr. Jacobus Vander Ploeg. He was to see that everything in the mythical jungle sequences was done wrong instead of right. The script writers didn't want folks writing in, saying this and that was wrong. Everything will be wrong, so the boys can answer, "We knew it all the time."

THE UNINVITED

Do you believe in ghosts? No, of course not. But after you've seen "The Uninvited," you'll always wonder a little. It's a beautiful picture, set in a quaint old English village on the Dover cliffs. Its love story is played against an eerie background of the supernatural, deftly and artistically handled. When you see it, you'll discover a brand new star. Her name is Gail Russell, and she's not only something to look at, but she's a finished little actress. Her portrayal of the spirit-haunted young Stella Meredith will fascinate you.

The story opens with the purchase of an old house called Wynwood, on a cliff overlooking the sea. Buyers: Rick Fitzgerald, a young London composer (Ray Milland), and his sister, Pam (Ruth Hussey). Sellers: Commander Beech (Donald Crisp) and his granddaughter, Stella, who was born in the house. It's a beautiful old place, but Rick and Pam soon discover it has definite drawbacks. The sound of a woman's heartbroken crying in the night. A cold white fog that appears and disappears on the spiral staircase. And, finally, the ghostly materialization of a dead woman.

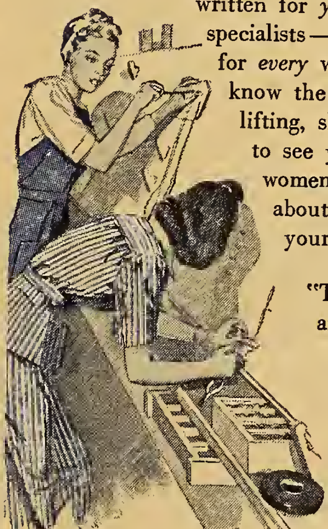
The woman is Mary Meredith, who lived with her artist husband in the house until Stella was three years old. Then came her tragic death, caused, people said, by Carmel, her husband's gypsy model. Now Mary's spirit is back and another spirit, too. But Rick and Pam don't discover the identity of that other until it's almost too

"I don't want to be an Absentee —but what's a girl to do?"

I know how important it is to stay on the job. So do plenty other women who miss work on "trying days". We know how much our plant—our country—depends on us, when every minute counts! But how can we keep going, at times when we feel like this?

Here's the Answer!

You'll learn how to feel better, when you learn the simple do's and don'ts you'll find in the booklet, "That Day Is Here Again"! It's a brand new booklet written for you by "problem day" specialists—the Kotex people. Written for every woman worker—who needs to know the facts about sleeping, diet, exercise, drinking, lifting, showers. It tells how to curb cramps. When to see your doctor. Gives advice for older women; and for when the stork's expected. Tells about tampons. And how to get more comfort from your sanitary napkins.



"That Day Is Here Again" is the answer to an S. O. S. from a war plant nurse. She reports that their greatest number of absentees are women who miss 1 to 3 days every month, frequently on "trying days". To aid these workers, and the war effort, Kotex offers this helpful handbook free of charge to all women!

Don't Lose Another Minute!

Send today for your free copy of the 24-page booklet, "That Day Is Here Again"! Remember, each time you stay at home—you slow up production—keep our boys away from home, longer! We take pride that we are able to give you this authentic information. Just as we take pride in the fact that more women use Kotex* sanitary napkins than all other brands of pads put together—to help them keep going in comfort!

late. They know only that a malevolent atmosphere broods over Wynwood, and that Commander Beech has forbidden Stella to enter the house. When she defies him and comes there, the result is incredibly sinister. Rick has fallen in love with Stella, and he is determined to exorcise the evil influence that hangs over her. But ghosts are difficult to dislodge, and it isn't until the very end that he finds there is one weapon always effective against them.

It takes a cast of more than ordinary ability to manage a story of the supernatural convincingly. Fortunately, it is present in "The Uninvited." Ray Milland is effective as the composer, and Ruth Hussey, Donald Crisp and Cornelia Otis Skinner are of considerable help. But Gail Russell's fresh, vibrant "Stella" runs away with the picture.—Par.

P. S.

Camera crews ran into their most serious case of temperment filming this one—the calm Pacific kept them waiting a week before it was angry enough to portray the wild, stormy English coast. . . . Research department looked for weeks before finding a sinister looking cliff with a single tree, described in Miss Macardle's book as the spot where Gail's film mother was killed. . . . Finally found an awe-inspiring sea cliff near Fort Ross, above San Francisco. . . . The Winward house set, with its circular stairway and small dayroom where the unhappy ghosts cried and moaned, was so realistic the cast and crew were always complaining of the cold though the set was as carefully air-conditioned as any other on the lot. . . . Ray Milland climbed the 35 steps of the stairway 500 times (by actual count) in two days' shooting. Five of these trips were made with Miss Russell in his arms. After the fifth trip Mr. Milland announced he'd never be able to make it again. Fortunately the last shooting was a good one, and it wasn't necessary for him to carry the 111 pounds of Miss Russell up the stairs again. . . . Exterior of the house was erected on the back lot, faithfully copied in every detail, even to the broken peak of the cornice over the entrance, from a photograph of an English house considered a classic specimen of the period. Sloping lawns in front of it were made of a curved wooded framework, 100 by 110 feet which was covered to a depth of two inches with dirt and 7500 square feet of real sod. . . . Special effects department had the troublesome job of creating and controlling a crawling gray mist that would slowly rise to the height and vague outline of a tall woman (supernaturally speaking). They finally perfected this mist, and now we hear it will be cut out for English showings as British censorship does not permit the showing of even a ghost of a spirit.

LIFEBOAT

You've waited a long time to see Tallulah Bankhead on the screen, but she's worth waiting for. Especially in a part like the one she has in this new Hitchcock picture. Alfred Hitchcock has been known as the "master of mysteries" for so long that everyone wondered a little when he started work on a straight war picture. But "Lifeboat" is typically Hitchcock and typically perfect. You wouldn't change a scene in it. And the cast is superlative.

The picture opens with a lifeboat drifting aimlessly on an empty sea. It looks lonely and helpless and at the mercy of the elements. You would expect anyone in it to be desperate with fear. But as it comes closer, you see a woman sitting in it, and she doesn't look frightened at all. She looks as if she had just left her Park Avenue apartment for a week-end in the country. Mink coat, jewel case, hair and make-up in perfect order. She is contemplating with a mild frown the only flaw in her ensemble—a run in her stocking!

It is at that moment that she discovers she is not, as she at first thought, the only survivor of the merchant ship which the Germans have just sent to the bottom. A husky seaman, covered with oil, swims up to the boat and clambers on board. He tells her his name is Kovak (John Hodiak), and he recognizes her as Mrs. Connie Potter (Tallulah Bankhead), a famous photographer whom he has seen on board ship.

Soon they pick up other survivors—a radio man, an American business man named Rittenhouse (Henry Hull), a crew member called Gus (William Bendix), a nurse (Mary Anderson) and several others. The boat is almost full now, but someone spots another man swimming desperately toward them. They haul him aboard, but Kovak takes one look and says angrily, "Throw him back! That's the captain of the U-boat that torpedoed us. We sunk them, too, and now let's get rid of this swine!"

Well—they don't throw him back. They let him stay, and that decision has strange consequences. As the days go by, the situation gets more and more tense. People's characters change oddly under circumstances like these, and the developments that follow have a somber fascination, all in the famous Hitchcock manner. —20th-Fox.

P. S.

Idea for the picture was Alfred Hitchcock's. Reading the accounts of survivors of ship sinkings who had lived for days and nights in lifeboats, he asked himself, "What assortment of human beings might logically be found in any one lifeboat? What do they do while awaiting rescue? What happens? What could happen?" . . . Producer Kenneth Macgowan agreed that Hitchcock had the premise for a great motion picture, and together they approached John Steinbeck with a proposal to write an original script. . . . Steinbeck accepted the challenge, went to New York, studied lifeboats, talked to actual survivors, then outlined a story. . . . Using the outline, top scenarist Jo Swerling wrote the actual screen play. . . . The Navy permitted a carefully investigated camera crew to film certain ocean backgrounds. The Merchant Marine briefly loaned the studio two modern 26-foot steel lifeboats. . . . Although only one boat appears in the final footage, five lifeboats were necessary to film the story: two authentic Welin boats, two replicas made in removable sections for close-ups and a rough wooden "rehearsal boat" in which Hitchcock perfected his cast in every detail of a scene before filming it. . . . Prior to "Lifeboat" discussions, Hitchcock and leading woman Tallulah Bankhead had met only once, and that was casually in a New York restaurant. Tallu was up at 6:30 every morning she worked, stayed until 7 or 7:30 in the evening, tottered home for dinner and was in bed by 9:00. She worked all day, six days a week until the production was finished, and was away only during the few days she had bronchitis. . . . New discovery John Hodiak shares an under-water kiss with Tallulah during the hurricane scene. According to the script girl's stop watch, they were buried under two successive waves for a total elapsed time of 37 seconds. . . . Their make-up when they first climbed out of the oily water into the boat was plain crank-case oil.

A GUY NAMED JOE

You'll want to see Van Johnson in this—he's the sensation of the year. He has Spencer Tracy to back him up, and that's nice backing! Spencer has a way of making any character he plays go straight to your heart. The guy he's portraying may be a show-off, a crazy, thoughtless fool, but you'll love him. You'll love Pete Sandidge in "A Guy Named Joe." Pete is, in some obscure way, you and me and every one of us. He makes mistakes, as we do, and he learns the hard way. But he learns. This picture is built around a fantastic but absorbing idea—that fliers who are killed don't really die. They stick around to help out some other pilot who needs them. Let's see how it works. . . .

Major Pete Sandidge (Spencer Tracy), stationed at an American air base in England, is a "hot" pilot. That means he can make his plane do any kind of trick in the air, but it also means he takes incredible and perhaps unnecessary risks. At least his superior officer, "Nails" Kilpatrick (James Gleason), thinks they're unnecessary. When Pete pays no attention to repeated warnings, "Nails" transfers him to reconnaissance duty in Scotland. Pete fumes and rages. "It's just like being retired!" he says furiously. But it doesn't work out quite that way. On the very night that Pete's sweetheart, Dorinda (Irene Dunne), flies in from England to see him, Pete goes out on scouting duty. He ends by sinking a German carrier he discovers, but his plane cracks up in the process. Pete is killed.

But Pete doesn't feel dead at all. He is welcomed by a flier he used to know and taken before the General (Lionel Barrymore), who doesn't seem dead either, in spite of the fact that he was killed in World War I. He explains to Pete that his job from now on is to be guardian angel to some living pilot who needs his help. The whole idea leaves Pete cold. Especially when he meets his particular charge—a shy, retiring air cadet named Ted Randall (Van Johnson). "I'll make him into the best flier that ever took off," Pete says, "but you can't make me like the guy!"

He likes him even less when Ted, now a crack pilot and far from shy, due to Pete's influence, goes to Australia and meets Dorinda. She's flying for the Ferry Command, and to Pete's utter disgust and astonishment, she falls for Ted. But Pete, dead or alive, won't let another guy have his girl! Or will he? Better go and see. It's a great picture.—M-G-M.

P. S.

Title for this one was suggested when General Clair Chennault, talking to his famous "Flying Tigers," said, "Boys, when I climb in that cockpit, I'm just another guy named Joe." . . . Three location trips took the company to South Carolina, Florida and Arizona. . . . In production ten months. Held up several weeks when Van Johnson went to hospital with a cracked head, the result of an automobile accident. Irene Dunne and Spencer Tracy refused to go on with the picture without him. . . . First picture Irene and Spencer have done together although they've both been at Metro for several years. . . . Irene Dunne and Victor Fleming were both given parties on the set. Irene celebrated her 15th wedding anniversary, and Victor had a birthday. . . . Tracy and Fleming have worked together on four previous pictures—two of them Academy Award epics. This was the fifth birthday party Spence has given for his friend. Their pictures are always in production at that time of year, and Spence always misses out. . . . Miss Dunne, recognized as one of the best dressed women in the country, wears only one gown in this picture. It's a fussy, ruffled white chiffon number which was selected by Tracy, Fleming and Ward Bond as the kind of dress a man admires. . . . This is Bond's first sympathetic role, and his work in it earned him a brand-new seven-year contract. . . . Barry Nelson plays an Army pilot in this picture. Soon's they finished shooting sequences, Barry went into the real air forces and is now in New York with the Air Corps show. . . . Jimmy Gleason and his stand-in, Joe Hinds, have been together for 18 years. . . . Three things Spencer hates most to do are dance, sing and play torrid love scenes. Does all three in "A Guy Named Joe."

THE LODGER

Even the most conservative feminine stars are showing their legs these days. Spurred on by Greer Garson's display of handsome gams in "Random Harvest," Merle Oberon now exhibits a slim and lovely pair in "The Lodger." And the fact that she's Lady Korda in private life doesn't prevent her from performing an elegant cancan.

But that is far from being the only attraction of the picture. It's a fictionized account of the career of Jack the Ripper, and it will probably scare you half out of your wits, while fascinating you completely. Back in the last century, London was terrorized by a series of apparently aimless killings. All the victims were women, and they were killed in so brutal a manner that the unknown murderer became known as Jack the Ripper.

As our picture opens, a new victim has just been discovered, lifeless in an alley, with the blood dripping slow and scarlet from the gash in her throat. We see a man come stealthily away from the vicinity of the crime. He is a big man (Laird Cregar) with dark, unblinking eyes and a curious hesitant way of speaking. We follow him as he engages a room in the home of the middle-class Burton family. The Burtons have never let rooms before, but as Mrs. Burton (Sarah Allgood) says, this Mr. Slade seems like a nice, quiet sort who won't give them any trouble.

The Burton's daughter, Kitty (Merle Oberon), a young music hall actress, has been away on tour. But she returns now for her London premiere, and Mr. Slade is immediately and obviously fascinated by her beauty. Kitty feels sorry for the lodger and scoffs at her mother, who is beginning to entertain some very sinister suspicions of Mr. Slade.

The next murder strikes closer. It is a woman Kitty knew, and John Warwick (George Sanders) comes from Scotland Yard to ask Kitty some questions. After one look at her, the only question he can think of to ask is if she'll have tea with him—Kitty has that effect on people. Meanwhile the crazed mind of the murderer is hungrily, madly plotting again. The next victim must be young and very beautiful—someone perhaps, like Kitty Burton. . . .

"The Lodger" is a brooding study of murder, artistically perfect and played by Laird Cregar with an almost terrifying depth of perception. You'll want to see it.—20th-Fox.

Scripter Barre Lyndon (author of "The Amazing Dr. Clitterhouse") has long wanted to do the story of Jack the Ripper for the screen. He spent weeks doing research at Pasadena's famous Huntington Library and perusing all available material from Scotland Yard. . . . Merle Oberon gets a chance to sing and dance on the screen for the first time in her career. Does "The Parisian Trot"—a modernized version of the cancan, and a second number named "Tink a Tin." . . . "Lodger" Laird Cregar reduced from 300 pounds to 250 for his role, studied his part from such experts as Pierson, who devoted a long chapter to the Ripper in his book, "Further Studies in Murder." . . . Cregar had wide scope for his characterization, since Jack was never captured, nor did anyone ever get close enough to him to describe him accurately. . . . The maid, Daisy, is played by Queenie Leonard, former star of London's Cochrane and Charlot Revues. . . . One of the Ripper's drunken victims is given a tight portrayal (no pun intended) by Helena Pickard, who in private life is Lady Hardwicke. . . . Director John Brahm comes originally from Vienna's Burg Theater. Specializes in pictures that demand blood-curdling atmosphere. . . . Altogether there are three murders in the picture, but the violence is never obvious—just suggested by forms fleeing desperately but vainly, swirls of fog, a cape-coat blowing in the wind. . . . Faithfully reproduced in every detail is the Black Museum of Scotland Yard, with its wax portrait gallery of famous criminals of Queen Victoria's day. Whitechapel, London, has been blasted off the map by the Luftwaffe, but is perfectly reconstructed in the picture, complete with the costers and their street songs.

SEE HERE, PRIVATE HARGROVE

You probably read the book and loved it. You'll love the picture, too. There is nothing funnier—or more pathetic—than a rookie during his first few weeks in the Army. Particularly a rookie like Marion Hargrove (Robert Walker). Hargrove was a writer before he went in the Army, and he just doesn't seem to be the soldier type. He even salutes wrong. He does it like a Prussian officer in the movies—clicking his heels and bowing slightly from the waist. He even gets the sergeant doing it that way eventually, to the captain's utter disgust. But as Hargrove points out, "My coordination has never been very good. Mother says I didn't learn to wave by-by till I was sixteen." Sergeant Cramp (Chill Wills) isn't at all sure he's kidding!

Hargrove has a couple of buddies, Esty (George Offerman, Jr.) and Mulvehill (Keenan Wynn). Buddies up to a point, but that doesn't include either girls or money. In those departments it's every guy for himself. One night Mulvehill and Esty are talking to a girl who was hostess at the Canteen. Her name is Carol (Donna Reed), and she's quite a pin-up girl. Hargrove gets a glimpse of her and clamors for an introduction. Mulvehill tells him that for the trifling sum of five bucks (payable next payday) he will arrange not only an introduction but a date for Saturday night. After all these weeks in the Army, Hargrove is still naïve. He hands over the five, and it isn't until he arrives at Carol's house, laden with candy and flowers, that he discovers she doesn't even know Mulvehill and Esty by name. The joke boomerangs, though, because Carol and Hargrove decide it's Destiny. Destiny is one name Mulvehill has never been called before!

Unfortunately Carol has to go back to her home in New York. The next few weeks Hargrove turns into a model soldier. (He wants a furlough!) His officers get together and try to figure out whether he's sick or they're crazy. Finally they even make him a corporal in charge of a group on maneuvers. But due to a little mis-

How're those New Year's resolutions standing up? Remember, you're positively honor-bound to keep the one about writing V-mail to a lonely Joe!

Along about now, you should have made and broken quite a few New Year's resolutions. Some of 'em, it seems, are just made to be broken, like the one that says, "I'll manicure my nails faithfully every week," and that other perennial—"I'll never lose my temper again." Well, here we come with some more, but ours are made to be kept. Can't promise any tangible prize if you do, but there's definitely an intangible one. Call it a sense of maturity. Call it the satisfaction of knowing that you're making yourself quite a nice gal.

Our first four resolutions are for all you wives and fiancées and practically-fiancées of servicemen. The last three are for everyone. So make 'em, now, and don't break 'em!

NO MORE MAIL CALL BLUES: He's gone, and there are no more ashes on the rug or big feet dangling off the end of the sofa or newspapers flung into corners or anything at all. So you're writing. You're putting all of you in letters, or almost all of you. You're being bright and fun and stalwart as a paratrooper. You're being your Saturday-night-best, and you're hiding like mad the sad, glum, letdown side of you. What you're going to do though, from now on, is get yourself a stack of V-mail (some post offices are giving it away free) and never use anything else for your overseas letters. That's strictly a resolution because hours . . . minutes even . . . count when you're way out there somewhere, telling time by the seconds you've got (Continued on page 94)

"Co-ed," up in the front of MODERN SCREEN (page 18), is Jean Kinkead's baby, and she loves it. "So will you," she told us this month. "Don't you see, the old column's too big for its britches. We've got to start a new 'Co-Ed'—broader in scope, better rounded. It's got to talk to service wives and overworked mothers and kids with their first real job. It's got to take people's problems and unknot them. Sure our space is limited, but gee, think what a job we can do by correspondence!" . . . "The other day," said Jean, "a cute little thingumabob told me, 'This is the second year my Valentine's been addressed to a P.O. number. Big, cushy hearts—via V-mail. Yeah, and another aching Valentine's day. I've got a problem, I have.' . . . Or there's the private's bride running up curtains for a furnished room. Tussling with a new job, a new town, new people. Or the great-hearted gal who wrestles with a riveting machine while her moppet's at school. With a house to think of—and Red Cross work—and canning to do—and no time—no time—no time." . . . Jean was in earnest. She looks cute when she's being earnest. We sat thinking how like these women she was herself. A war wife with a job. A jive hound who'd Lindy half the night if there weren't a baby to see to at 6 . . . That new "Co-ed" of hers is like a bright light suddenly flicking on. And the way she answers your letters—but, heck, just write her and see. Address your envelope: Jean Kinkead, MODERN SCREEN, 149 Madison Avenue, New York 16, New York. Jean's crazier about letters than a pack of overseas G.I.'s at mail call. And don't worry—if you want things kept confidential, just tell Jean so. She won't even repeat it to her husband!

Director of "Higher and Higher" nixed coaching, said, "Sinatra does O.K. just being himself; let him stay that way." (With cinema wife, Barbara Hale.)

Back from Coast with Pidgeon, Sinatra found wife and young'un waiting, also mob wearing "Welcome Home, Frank Sinatra" pins.

At draft board, before he was 4-F'ed, Frank told press he hoped he'd be allowed to hang around for glimpse of new baby, thought he'd make good soldier, wanted whack at OCS.

● The doorbell rang around ten o'clock Saturday, and Nancy knew who it would be even before it had stopped ringing. The kids, of course. Frankie's beloved kids. Maybe there'd be three of them. Maybe 100. You never knew. She opened the door, and there they were; millions of them, all looking alike in their reversibles, bandannas and moccasins. "Hi. Nancy."

"Hi."

"Is he up yet?"

"Having his breakfast." She knew what the next question would be, so she beat them to it. "Orange juice, scrambled eggs, toast and coffee."

The group smiled benignly. "Gosh," they breathed. Having gotten the daily bulletin, they were ready to go. "Need anything downtown, Nancy?"

Nancy closed the door and went into the breakfast room. Frankie had his head in the morning paper, but he withdrew it when he heard her come in, and his face got that look it always gets when she's around.

"Morning, Mom. Sit down and help me eat some of this."

She took a piece of toast. "Guess who was at the door."

"The kids?" You'd think he'd be good and blasé about it by now, but he isn't. Nancy nodded and then grinned because he looked so surprised and pleased. "Gee whiz," he said.

Strictly unorthodox, the whole picture. Fans ringing a big star's doorbell and calling his wife "Nancy." It couldn't happen to Nelson Eddy. But the Sinatras are screwy that way. They don't seem to mind. They'd no more think of hiring a maid to brush off the swooners than they would of posting "No Trespassing" signs around their house. "Gosh, Mom, some of them come awfully far. Be nice to them." That's Frankie. "Nice" is putting it mildly. She invites them in to play with Nancy Sandra, she feeds them Pepsis, she (Continued on page 83)

LOVABLE LUG

Sonny Tufts used to gag up a love scene like Durante.

Yet there was something about this big, smiling guy . . .

It was 8 A.M. one recent morning, away out in Bel-Air. Sonny Tufts was due on the set in Hollywood in a half-hour. And there was that tire—flat as a pancake!

He called a taxi. "Maybe in a couple hours, Mac," said a bored voice. "Yeah everybody's got to get to work, Mac. This is war, Mac. Sorry Mac."

But Sonny Tufts did have to get to work—clear in at Paramount, or hold up a lot of people and get himself in a jam. The minutes were ticking away. He was in a tight spot. He dialed another number.

"Oh, hello, Mr. Tufts," said a voice. "What? Sure—I'll send one right out. Don't mention it. Son—er—Mr. Tufts. Anything for a pal."

So Sonny Tufts got to work on time and the guy he had to thank was a very good friend of his—the doorman at a Beverly Hills hotel, where he'd stayed once.

Mr. Bowen Charleston Tufts, III, has been making all kinds of friends and influencing all kinds of people ever since he came to Hollywood a few months ago. It's not on purpose, but just because Sunny Sonny is the friendliest, most charming and disarming big hunk of natural man to hit town in years. It's absolutely no accident that the out-country cash customers, too, took one look at "Kansas" in "So Proudly We Hail" and said "Hello, Pal!" to make this big, easy going, grinning blond giant the screen sensation of a nation in one easy-to-take lesson.

Sonny Tufts just naturally likes everybody and everybody likes him. For instance, when he and his wife, Barbara, were house hunting a few weeks ago, they called to see a place late one afternoon where the tenants were still roosting. Now, anybody hates to have house hunters prowl around where they're still living, especially right before dinner. There's always a bed that's not made or something cooking on the stove. Sonny would never barge in on anybody like that in normal times, but around Hollywood these days you grab a house if you can, and any way you can and—the Tufts had been living in auto camps too long.

Well, the stand-offish atmosphere lasted about two seconds flat. Then the tenants were telling Sonny and Barbara the hidden secrets of their lives and confiding just what you had to watch out for in this particular shack, and then the man said, "How about a drink?" and the maid came in and announced dinner. "Why don't you (Continued on page 87)

Sonny, who'd eaten in restaurants too long to like it, laid law down to Barbara when they were married. Brags now that she could teach Oscar of the Waldorf!

Barbara infects Sonny with panic at every personal appearance; won't walk on stage till he's pushed. Here with Marie MacDonald on set of "I Love a Soldier."

The chassis isn't Petty, or the profile swoony, but Peggy Ryan knows the shortest distance to the heart of a sturdy Marine!

Almost two decades ago, The Ryans, a vaudeville team extraordinaire, were booked into the Palace Theater in Oklahoma City. Beyond that fact stretched a vista of other Palace Theaters situated in bigger and better towns until at last that heaven where all good troupers go, the Palace in New York City, loomed as part of a roseate future.

The Ryans had one small son who became an occasional extemporaneous character in the act, and the Ryans had talked desultorily about having another youngster. They had put off the event because of their roving life. Now they knew that they had to make a decision. They must decide on a permanent career or upon a family. Headline spots at the various Palaces or a brief notice under the heading, Vital Statistics.

They decided to have another child, and that's why, in 1944, in a picture titled "Chip Off The Old Block," a 19-year-old dynamo (Continued on page 112)

STORY—The foreman of Todd's Toys—Tantalizing Trinkets For Titillating Tots—gaped at production line four. Production line four was Todd's special Dopey Donkeys. The foreman prided himself on a knowledge of a donkey's anatomy; nowhere, not even on a Dopey Donkey, should a tail be found where the ears should be and the ears, vice versa, where a tail should be. Yet with every inexorable crank of the production gear the donkeys were marching off, listening, as it were, to what went on behind.

"Miss Rogers!" the foreman shouted.

"Yes, sir," the pretty girl said.

"Miss Rogers," the foreman said sweetly, "where the devil do you keep your brains?"

"Right between my ears," Miss Rogers said.

"I could answer that," said the foreman. "I have the perfect answer. But I won't. Do you realize that this is the third time you've messed up a batch of Dopey Donkeys?"

"Is it?" said Miss Rogers blankly. (Continued on page 106)

PRODUCTION—What went on between shots of "Standing Room Only" was almost as screwy as the picture itself. Fred and Paulette turned into a two-man quiz program, kept up a continuous flow of questions and answers and succeeded in driving the whole outfit nutty. It was all about farming. Now that Paulette is running Burgess Meredith's farm in Suffern County, N. Y., the chickens and alfalfa crop are almost as important as learning her lines. Fred is conducting a series of agricultural experiments at home which, if they work out, will be used on his two country farms. The test farm is turning him into a minor league Burbank. The pair sounded more like farmer Jones and the dairy maid at a county fair than the top box office numbers they are. . . . Between long distance calls to the farm, Paulette found time to work out a new hair-do with her friend and hairdresser, Hedwig Moorud. You'll see her wearing her new puff-behind-the-ear affair in the picture. It's sure to start a new fad. . . . For the first time in her career, Paulette appeared on set minus stockings. She wore leg make-up throughout (Continued on page 112)

Tucked into bed that night with her two cracked ribs, Judy broke into sudden giggles.

"What's funny?" Mother felt her forehead. "Could be all the excitement's gone to your head."

"No, it's just that Hollywood's so different from what I expected."

"You thought movie stars'd come shooting from all corners." That was mother's friend, whose apartment they were going to share. Let's call her Edith.

Judy nodded vigorously. "And it's only a town with a main street and little houses climbing up the hills—"

"That's all it is, honey. Anyway, from the outside looking in."

That's all it would ever be to her then, Judy thought, drowsing off to sleep. Far as Hollywood went, she'd always be on the outside looking in.

Not that it bothered her. Like any kid, she loved going to movies, but she'd never been one of the gaping mob, and living in Hollywood made no difference. She didn't strain against the ropes at previews, she didn't hang around restaurants with an autograph book, she never said, "If only I could get into pictures—" Except that it was cleaner and she missed her friends, Hollywood was just an extension of life (Continued on page 38)

Fall, 1942. Work on "Slightly Dangerous" with Robert Young interrupted by stretch of anemia that sent her to hospital. Marriage annulled. Baby on way. Lana clammed up, would say nothing about remarrying Steve

First hint of remarriage came on Valentine's Day when Lana, out of sick bed, sat quietly at Mocambo with Steve planning for baby.

Untroubled by whispers buzzing round their heads, newlyweds had knockout time at Abbott and Costello's Rallerbowl party. Ignored rumar that Steve, 4-F, had splurged last $10,000 tearing dawn gates to H'wood, then nixed 2 studio offers.

The routine lasted just three months. If Judy'd been crazy about typing, it might have lasted indefinitely. But typing was a pain any day of the week, and one day the sunlight was more than she could resist. So she cut class and strolled over to the drugstore for a coke.

Fate had sent Billy Wilkerson, editor of the "Hollywood Reporter," into the same drugstore at the same time. Looking up from his own coke, he saw a small figure seated opposite at the circular counter. Chestnut hair, wide-set eyes, peachbloom skin above the white blouse and red vestee sweater. Pretty girls were a dime a dozen hereabouts, but there was something about this one that breathed the very spirit of lovely, budding youth—

"Who's that kid?" he asked the manager when she'd gone.

"One of the high school crowd. The others call her Judy."

"I'd like to meet her."

"Well, come in around three, and I'll introduce you. They all gang up here for (Continued on page 77)

tall, dark and rugged

This fella Craig's got his own design for living . . . and what if it does include a barnyard for cackling chickens and a tyke who always talks back!

Morning after Craig's house burned to ashes, Jim strode into studio in bedroom slippers, Paisley dressing gown, needed only turban to look like visiting maharajah or something out of his current "Kismet."

The day James Craig's contract started at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, more than a year ago, he showed up on the set bright and early and ready to work as usual.

He looked fresh as a daisy, and not a soul at M-G-M suspected—and they won't until they read this—that Jimmy hadn't had a wink of sleep for two nights. That instead, he'd traveled 1200 miles on a motorcycle and shagged his big frame up and down Sierra mountain peaks between that Monday morning and the Saturday before.

Jimmy Craig did that because he wanted some venison on his ranch-house table, and the deer season opened that week-end. His hunting pals had a trip organized, but Jimmy had to make pictures. By Saturday, when he knocked off acting, they were clear up in Beaver, Utah, some 600 miles from Hollywood. Jimmy had to be on the set first thing Monday, under a new contract. But (Continued on page 99)

Jim's wild plaid jackets cause only fireworks in Craig household. Mary can't stand 'em. Also resents Jim's Sunday spaghetti, rife with garlic. J.'s worked for du Pont as carpenter's helper, timekeeper, radio star.

Jim can quote Shelley, Keats and Wordsworth on into the night, but won't. Can't sing a note, but does. Was once told, "Your voice is pitched too high, your neck's too thick, you carry yourself like a prizefighter, and you can't act." Craig's terse reply, "Nuts!"

Jim, ordinarily mild, used to gnash teeth when aunts called him "Sunny Jim." Took "Craig" from old flic, "Craig's Wife." High point of career: day he sold 10 doz. of his eggs on set.

When "the Bub" hit two, pop started reading him Texas' tallest tales about "Big Foot Wallace" and other two-gunners, "so he'd never grow up to be a gosh-darn panty-waist."

Paulette's been selling property right and left lately. Asked why, she shrewdly replied, "For profit. I can't resist 40 percent over what I paid."

By Kaaren Pieck

The boys call her "Polly"

How are you going to figure this Goddard, hobnobbing with artists 'n' farmers, buddies with every darn guy in Frisco's military hospital?

Paulette read the script of "So Proudly We Hail," and said no thanks.

"Why not?" asked Mark Sandrich, producer and director.

"Because I couldn't play that girl the way she's written."

"Why not?" asked Allan Scott, writer.

"Because I don't believe in her. Okay, she's flip and flirtatious. She's out to meet the boys. She trails across Bataan, dropping black nightgowns as she goes. But no girl could see what she saw, live through what she did, and not grow up. No girl that's human—"

"I think she's got something there," said Scott.

She wrote the new scene herself—the scene where she faints and refuses to quit work—and they put it in just as she wrote it.

The picture marked a turning-point for Paulette. In a star-studded cast, she stood out for her crisp humor and her telling way with a line. Audiences ate her up. Mark Sandrich said to Allan Scott, "For my next picture, I want you to write a story round Paulette." Scott wrote "I Love a Soldier." I is Paulette, girl welder. The soldier's Sonny Tufts. Wait till you see them together again.

If "So Proudly" gave her a new importance in pictures, she says she has Sandrich to thank. He put her completely at ease for the first time. For the first time, she didn't have to press or project. It's a glorious feeling, and once you get it, you don't lose it. So she's forever in Mark Sandrich's debt.

Because the screen is her first love. Take everything else away, she could still go on. Take her work away, and everything else would go flat. When she was under contract to Chaplin and Selznick, being paid a good part of the time for twirling her thumbs, she used to cry—literally cry—to be put to work. If she has a decision to make—whether it affects the routine of her day or the course of (Continued on page 66)

The Golden Apple:

Each year the Hollywood Women's Press Club awards a golden apple lapel pin to the most cooperative actress, and a script holder decorated with a golden apple to the most cooperative actor. In 1941, Bob Hope won the award, and this feat he duplicated in 1943. Since he already owned a script holder, he was awarded a golden St. Christopher medal to protect him during the extensive tours he will undoubtedly make in 1944. Bob appeared at the luncheon always given to honor the winners, wearing a well-tailored checkerboard and a straw skimmer, his costume for "The Road to Utopia."

"This is to keep Crosby from getting homesick for a horse blanket," he explained. He also clarified his attitude about being cooperative; he admitted with the celebrated Hope leer that he had seldom met a lady with whom he would not like to cooperate.

Trying to nose Señor Hope (an impossible attempt, he said, considering his ski slide) out of first place this year were Humphrey Bogart, who came in a strong second, and George Murphy, who came in third.

Cary Grant, who won last year and thereupon became the only male member of the feminine press club, was invited to be present and wound up reading the inscription engraved on the back of Bob's award. He kidded Bob by stuttering, stammering, and placing great emphasis upon the flattering script of the words etched in gold until Bob finally arose to protest. "You," he said, rolling his eyes, "are making a jerk of me. After this I'll read my own compliments."

Ask Corp. George Montgomery about this walking juke box with the honey voice. Or ask a million cheering guys in khaki!

One November night in 1942, strapping George Montgomery Letz was bussing dishes around the Hollywood Canteen. He was carrying a super-loaded tray when Dinah Shore appeared on the platform to sing. He didn't drop the tray, which proves with finality how great is his self-control.

George had never met Dinah, but he had heard her sing over the radio so often that he had ceased to refer to the instrument as a GE or a Zenith or a Sparton, but simply called all wave lengths, long or short, Shore.

George tried to work his way through the darkened canteen in an attempt to carry on his duties. George, accompanied by a load of used plates and cups, had been heading for the front door.

He unloaded his tray with the greatest speed ever attained locally without breakage and scorched back to hear Dinah's tenth, fifteenth and fortieth encore. When the enthusiastic G I.s finally allowed another performer to take over the mike, George found himself—by one of those incredible coincidences which have to be planned thirty minutes in advance—at the foot of the stage steps.

And from that night on they went steady, as Dinah says.

Three or four nights later (Continued on page 69)

Moment after the "I do's," Dinah was introducing George, via long distance, to his new father-in-law in Nashville. One week later, groom was yanked away by Army.

Harry James describes new nursery in painful details to anybody who'll listen. Approved when Lamour said she'd shelve career in second to follow husband. Fanny Rose Letz (D. Shore) scooted back to work right after wedding.

Dinah, who's in "Thank Your Lucky Stars," must keep 300 songs on tap to fill varied requests of Army and Navy joes. Before marriage, shared crackerbox apt. with 3 chums, later took slightly larger house with them.

Dinah did final rehearsal for 1st broadcast in slacks, found she'd forgotten to bring skirt. By time show went on air, she'd wheedled one from girl in audience.

On Command Performance together, Bing Crosby grinningly bowed and scraped before La Shore after she'd shortwaved program for British Army at request of King and Queen who listened from Buckingham Palace.

cooperative spirit, we writers found Annie Sheridan to have been a doll in 1943. One vote behind her in the final tally was Lucille Ball, and one vote behind Lucille was Carole Landis. When the margin is as small as this, the girls may be justified in thinking that all three were entitled to high praise. Both Lucille and Carole were invited to attend the party. Lucille was able to accept and was presented with an armload of roses, but Carole was in New York.

Awarded a sneer for playing hard to get were Errol Flynn, Charles Boyer and Bing Crosby in the male department, and Joan Fontaine, Ginger Rogers, and Greer Garson among the ladies. Joan has been ill a good deal of the time recently, but this writer, for one, has always found her to be sweet, intelligent and more than willing to assist a scribe.

Kiddie Kapers:

If you can't endure the Kindergarten Kreeps, just skip this. But if you dote on diminutive doings, here's a report on one of the heartbreakers of 1960, Miss Alice Faye Harris by name, now aged 22 months. Everyone in Hollywood who has been a guest in the Harris home goes into ecstasies over Alice, Jr.

She has a sunny head covered with curly hair and such eyelashes as have not been seen since Garbo fluttered an elegant orb.

When guests arrive, Miss Alice gravely shakes hands with everyone. Then she toddles to her nursery, gets her small chair, brings it back to the living room and places it in some strategic position. With head tipped earnestly on one side, she looks steadfastly at the person who is talking and nearly breaks up the speaker by her very seriousness.

Afterward she spends hours doing the things the guests did: She searches through an imaginary purse for a lipstick or straightens a make-believe hat or imitates a voice.

When Phil broadcasts, his enthusiastic daughter brings her chair to a spot about a foot in front of the radio and there listens raptly. She sings with the orchestra, keeping time by tapping one little foot or softly clapping her chubby hands. And she laughs like mad at everything Phil says.

No wonder Alice, Senior, is so delighted with the thought of the new baby due in the spring. With two such honeys, the Harris household will be filled with happiness kids.

John Payne slips in and out of town with no one but his most intimate friends being the wiser. While here, he spends his entire time with his daughter, lovely 3-year-old Julie. On a recent trip (made by air on the authority of a 3-day pass) he took Julie as his lady love to a dinner party. When they made ready to leave, John decided that it was too cold for Julie's light coat, so added his own G.I. windbreaker as a blanket around her small figure.

Sleepily she cocked her head on one side and smiled at him. "My head," she confided, "is cold, too. Don't you think I should wear your pretty hat with the shiny stuff on it?"

So small Julie, muffled in her daddy's jacket and rendered invisible under her daddy's Army cap, curled upon the seat of John's car and went to sleep on the way home.

They were having trouble with Margaret

Judy's pet story, lately, has been about Laddie's shopping sortie before Xmas. Mobbed in dept. store, he dashed out, hailed first car, begged ride around corner.

O'Brien on the set of "Meet Me in St. Louis." Ordinarily she is a quick study and a perfect deliverer of lines, but something was obviously wrong on this particular morning. The luncheon scene being shot required one of the adult members of the cast to say something about the catsup being too spicy. And a second adult was to add to the criticism by saying the catsup was too sour.

Whereupon Margaret was to pipe up with another criticism of the catsup: "And the color is funny, too."

Each time the dialogue swung around to Margaret, she mumbled an unintelligible phrase while hanging her head in obvious distaste. Finally Director Minelli took Margaret aside. "You aren't doing it right," he explained gently. "I've told you four times that you mustn't duck your head and jumble your words together under your breath. Tell me, honey, what's the trouble?"

"I don't like the dialogue," said the pint-sized prima donna. "It reminds me of the three bears. I sound like the baby bear, 'Somebody has been eating my soup and eaten it all up.' I don't want to sound like any old baby bear."

The dialogue was changed. Made somewhat more mature.

Just before Christmas Bing Crosby brought his squad of four sons over to Paramount to have a group picture made. Because of the affinity of the junior male for dust, dirt, mud and other forms of untidiness, Bing also brought along four suits of clothes and four shirts so that a costume change could be made at the last minute, so giving the camera an immaculate view of the Crosby quartet.

First he took them to the barber, who turned out four neat haircuts. Then he took them over to the set, upon request, to meet Betty Hutton who was working in "The Incendiary Blonde." Betty, as incendiary as her picture, approached Bing with a Comanche yell and planted a juicy kiss on his forehead.

Dennis took exception to this demonstration of comradeliness. "You'll have to cut that out," he warned her gravely. "My dad's taken the pedge." (Continued on following page)

Betty, knitting small items on set as husband worked, posed with Harry between takes for cartoonist Xavier Cugat. Says she doesn't care whether baby's boy or girl, but "it better have its father's disposition."

at Mocambo, with George Billingsly, its manager.

From the Hutton set, Bing took his offsprings to the stage on which "Road to Utopia" was being filmed. While he did a scene—which he thought might be interesting to the boys—the boys voiced an artistic criticism by sneaking away. On one of the studio streets they met Mr. Y. Frank Freeman, head of the studio and a man who knows how beats the heart of a boy. He took them over to introduce them to his prize boxer pups.

When Bing arrived breathless somewhat later, chaos was thick in the air. The pups, having wallowed lavishly in puddles created by a recent California downpour, had been held by the boys and had pawed them thoroughly. Two of the boys had gotten into a fight about one of the pups and had engaged in brotherly combat to the extent of one torn shirt and one claret nose.

The photographic sitting had to be postponed.

Editor, Modern Screen:

In an article in your November issue appears a story "Moonlight Sinatra" by Jeanne Karr. The writer describes a much beribboned Marine who happened to be in the crowd at one of the stops made by Sinatra. In explaining his decorations to a couple of gaga young things, he was supposed to have said—in an offhand way as Marines are always supposed to speak when questioned about their brave exploits—that one of the ribbons, with star, represented Attu. This Marine seems to have gone to a lot of trouble to glorify himself. There was to my knowledge only one Marine on Attu, and in addition to that fact is another: The Government has not even author-

Cheryl Crane, who coos when you call her "Cherry," has stocks cherry-embroidered dresses carted back from N.Y. by Daddy. La back to work after many months, spends days off fussing over b ized the wearing of that particular star and ribbon as yet. If such a ribbon and star is authorized we'd sure like to know which dime store has them in stock as we feel, in an offhand modest way of course, entitled to wear it, having had a few bad moments on Attu ourselves.

We are not resentful in any case, but we do get a bit fed up when the Fighting Marines get credit for a job we did by our lonesome. They get plenty of build-up without stealing our thunder.

Sincerely,
The Boys of Co. D—17th Infantry.

Ans. from Jeanne Karr: In an offhand, modest way—as all Marines are supposed to talk—this Marine was undoubtedly pulling somebody's offhand, modest leg. Not only did he say he had seen action on Attu, he said he had been wounded there. A Jap was supposed to have thrust four inches of bayonet into his stomach. Perhaps his entire story should have been doubted when he admitted that he had never heard of Frankie. Those, sir, are fighting words, Marine or not.

Miles of File:

You remember Joan Carroll, the enchanting young thing who bowled them over in "Panama Hattie" when Ethel Merman was Hattie on Broadway. Joan, now 11, is working at Metro in "Meet Me in St. Louis." Between shots she keeps busy, working with her filing system which is an outcropping of her patriotic spirit.

It seems that since Joan has been in Hollywood, she has been the constant recipient of much of John Carroll's fan mail. Lt. John Carroll is now serving overseas, but his fan mail continues to be voluminous, and it continues to find its way through rain and sleet and snow and dark of night to Joanie, who is not related to him in any way.

In the old days, Joan simply forwarded the mail in cardboard boxes. Nowadays she conscientiously opens and reads every letter. Then she relegates it to a pigeon-hole for the attention of her lieutenant when he returns to Hollywood. The labels under which she files the letters are devised and printed by Miss Carroll, and they tell a graphic story, to wit: "Mash Notes," "Proposals of Marriage," "Just Fan," "Begging," "From Service Men" and lastly, "Silly Stuff."

Sorry Glory:

Undoubtedly, while you were doing your Christmas shopping, you stood in an exhausted line, wishing to goodness that you were so famous that you could march grandly into a shop, order everything in sight with a queenly wave of the hand and retire to ribbons, wrappings and a royal enjoyment of Christmas.

Fame, in a pack-jammed shop, actually amounts to nothing, so be comforted. During Christmas week, Lana Turner entered one of Beverly Hills' swankiest establishments and approached the purse and handbag section. She made one selection—a rare red Moroccan leather bag—and set it aside. Then she turned to examine a brown alligator purse.

Meanwhile, one of those amphibious feminine landing boats hove up to the counter, panting with haste, and began to paw through the merchandise. She spied the red bag in front of Lana, snatched it, jerked open the zipper, examined the fittings, then began to shout for the salesgirl. "Please wrap this as a gift and charge it to my account," she bellowed.

Lana, in her soft voice, tried to protest. "I had selected that bag," she explained gently. "If you will remember, you actually removed it from beneath my own purse."

"That's too bad," sniffed the woman. "I have the purse now." (Continued on page 117)

Beauty at Your Fingertips

Tips on good grooming for your ten pretty and busy fingers.

Learn the rules, then treat your digits to a manicure!

Your hands are showing, you know . . . whoops now, it's quite all right if they're in condition and lovely to hold. But woe is you if they're worn, rough looking, and the nails chipped or broken. Therein lies many a sad tale—a broken romance, an embarrassing situation, a drawback to your job. 'Tis true your favorite male admires your working on the assembly line but he doesn't admire grubby, drab-looking hands.

But let's not be pessimistic, children, let's look on the bright side. A pair of rightly tended, dainty paws can be one of a femme's most attractive features. A bit of care is all they ask for. These being the days when time is of the essence, how's about a quick, easy recipe for a manicure. The ingredients: ten fingernails, your manicure set and a gay shade of nail enamel. The results: ten gleaming, shining fingertips.

TECHNIQUE, YOU SAY? Begin your digit work by arranging all the items needed for your manicure on a convenient, near-by table. Then set to according to this Hollywood formula which we have gleaned for you.

1. Remove old polish with a cleansing tissue saturated with oily polish remover. Be sure every trace of the old color is completely gone.

2. File and shape nails with an emery board. Be careful not to file too deeply into the corners. The side of the nail tip should be a rounded curve . . . the tips, graceful ovals. Claw-like nails are definitely dated. Then too, medium length fingertips are less likely to bend or break.

3. Next, dip your ten fingers into a bowl of warm, soapy water. If you have time, soak them for a few minutes. With your brush, scrub each finger separately. Be sure to dry them thoroughly. If your nails are particularly brittle and dry, a warm oil soaking will put them in the pink.

4. With a cotton-tipped orangewood stick dipped in cuticle remover, gently but firmly push back the cuticle. This helps to remove dead skin around the base of the nail, keeps them trim and smooth looking. Cut the cuticle only if you want to encourage infection.

5. Apply nail white under the free edges of the nail. Either the paste or stick form may be used. Next, scrub your fingers a second time and wipe them dry. As you do this, you'll be removing the last shreds of cuticle loosened by the cuticle remover.

6. Now gently buff your nails in one direction. This makes for stronger, healthier nails, besides helping to pep up the circulation.

7. Colorless, liquid polish for a base makes a smooth foundation for enamel. Apply two coats for longer lasting wear.

8. A gay, exciting shade of nail enamel goes on over the colorless coating. Quick, downward strokes of the brush are easier to apply. When the first application dries, follow up with a second coating. And presto! How shiny and bright are your ten pretty fingertips.

When your nail glamour is completely dry, slather a creamy lotion or hand cream over your paws. Massage the skin well as you apply. All this, in the interest of smoothness. (Continued on page 93)

Color, color . . . what's your hue? Is it yellow, red or blue? Take your pick, shade's no matter!

Yours to choose what's sure to flatter.

Warner Brothers' Joan Winfield applies nail polish with four neat brush strokes. She chooses a lacquer to harmonize with rouge and lipstick, and one that provides contrast to her clothes.

A careful brush outline is filled in with lipstick. Joan totes a small wad of tissues in her handbag to insure a fresh start for each application of lipstick and to remove neatly smeared color.

Supposing we offered you a screen color test? How would you rate? Would you compare colorfully to Betty Grable or Lucille Ball of the Technicolor screen? Or would that be you . . . that girl wearing cerise polish on her fingertips, rust on her lips and red, red rose for cheek color, all added to a burgundy dress and pink harlequin goggle frames? That mass of clash all blurred around the edges, would that be you?

SHADES OF VERMILION. You can say that again! It should be common knowledge that lipstick, rouge and nail polish must harmonize. The lips and nails can naturally stand a heavier shading than the cheek. Ofttimes the blended threesome is offered by one company. Or the items can be matched by eye from your favorite brands on the beauty counters. And the least color conscious lass can see the smartness of matching accessories such as a hat, a scarf, some buttons or earrings to the red of her glamour aids.

MATCH 'EM, DON'T MIX 'EM. Blue, red and yellow are the primary colors. If you watched an artist mix his paints, you would see the entire range of reds on his palette is made up of either different quantities of red mixed with blue, or red mixed with yellow. Thus your nail polishes, lipsticks and rouges are either true un-mixed reds, yellow-reds or blue-reds. The pitfall to avoid is mixing these three types of color. It is a clashful catastrophe to apply blue-red for nail lacquer, a blatant clear red for cheek color and a garish orange for lip shading. Smart girls get a set of matching nail polish, rouge and lipstick in each category. No matter the occasion or the costume, they are all set with cosmetic accessories that fit.

THE COLOR WHEEL. Round and round it goes, where it stops nobody knows. Is that the way you choose your cosmetic accessory colors? If you're at a loss for the proper lacquer and paint to wear with your particular wardrobe . . . read on:

conception on his part about the Red and Blue armies, when maneuvers are over, he's Private Hargrove again.

There's lots more, including Hargrove's trip to New York, but it's more fun to see it for yourself. When you come out, you're going to be awfully proud of our "rookies." And you'll go for young Robert Walker as Private Hargrove.—M-G-M.

P. S.

Marion Hargrove, a private when he wrote "See Here, Pvt. Hargrove," is now a Sgt. stationed somewhere in China with "Yank" magazine. . . . Harry Kurnitz, Metro staff writer, had to write a plot around Sgt. Hargrove's book which would include most of the humorous incidents in the book and provide a running theme and plot which the story originally didn't have. . . . Kurnitz also wrote in a sweetheart, played by Donna Reed, and the sweetheart's father, Robert Benchley. . . . Cast and crew made two location trips—one to Fort Bragg, North Carolina, and another to Camp Roberts, California. . . . Besides Private Hargrove, the only other real-life character in the picture is Private Mulvehill, played by Keenan Wynn. . . . Mr. Wynn is third generation Wynn to come to Metro. His grandfather was Frank Keenan, silent player, and his father is Ed Wynn. . . . Army sent Captain Edward J. Flynn to Hollywood to act as technical advisor for the film. Captain Flynn was public relations officer at Fort Bragg and was able to give writers and directors valuable information about Pvt. Hargrove that wasn't included in his book. . . . The captain admitted having trouble with the extras in the picture. It was his job to train them to march, salute, make beds and do dishes Army style so soldier audiences could find no flaw. This was a difficult task but he finally accomplished it to his satisfaction. Hardest part was teaching them to salute with same smartness as Johnny Doughboy. . . . Only song in "Private Hargrove" is juke box favorite, "In My Arms," sung by Bob Crosby. Incidentally, this is Bob's first picture without his band. . . . Crosby did K.P. through most of the picture. Spent more time cleaning, washing, sweeping and mopping than the average buck private does in his entire Army career.

IN OUR TIME

Paul Henreid is not only a super-attractive male, but a great actor. He proved it in "Casablanca," and he adds emphasis to the proof in this new picture. Ida Lupino, who plays opposite him, knows all the answers in the acting line, too, and the result is a pleasure to watch.

"In Our Time" is the story of a country betrayed. Betrayed not once but many times, not by one man but by a whole class. The country is Poland, and her betrayers are the ruling class which exploited the peasants for hundred of years and finally left them to the merciless onslaught of the Germans. But particularly this picture is the story of an English girl who falls in love with a handsome Polish aristocrat. And of her struggle to save him from his family's decadent influence.

The girl is Jennifer Whittridge (Ida Lupino), secretary to a London antique dealer. The dealer, Mrs. Bromley (Mary Boland), goes to Warsaw on business and takes her secretary with her. There Jennifer meets Count Stephan Orvid (Paul her whole life. Stephen represents the best and the worst of the old Polish world. He is charming, gracious—and almost entirely useless. He belongs to what is called in New York, Café Society. But when he meets Jennifer, he falls passionately in love with her. He even defies his powerful Uncle Pavel (Victor Francen) to marry her.

Stephen's family resents Jennifer. His sister, Janine (Nancy Coleman), is jealous of her. His mother (Nazimova) is upset by the changes Jennifer brings to their life. For Jennifer persuades Stephen to manage the estate himself, to work the farm, to buy tractors and even to give the peasants a share in the harvest. "Revolutionary!" cries Janine. "Yes," says Jennifer quietly, "but practical."

Meanwhile the shadow of war creeps closer. Suddenly it is there—Poland has been invaded! Stephen joins his cavalry regiment and leaves Jennifer to run the estate. Gradually it becomes clear that she, an English girl, represents the true spirit of Poland. A country betrayed but never beaten!—War.

P. S.

Title comes from the late Neville Chamberlain's statement on his return from Munich—"I bring you peace in our time." . . . Two famous Russians in the cast are Alla Nazimova and Michael Chekhov, nephew of writer Anton Chekhov. . . . Director Vincent Sherman once worked as an actor in a minor role in one of Nazimova's stage plays, "Ghosts." . . . Technical director was Dr. Stephen Barash, Polish attorney. Captured by the Nazis after the siege of Warsaw, he made his way to this country via the Baltic states, the Soviet Union and China. . . . Interested bit player was Lucilia von Boden, Los Angeles music teacher, who said she had been a childhood sweetheart of Herman Goering. . . . Ida Lupino conquered a great dislike for horses and learned to ride for the film. Also added cow-milking to her list of accomplishments. Mood of the set could be felt the minute a visitor stepped through the heavy sound stage doors. Blackest days were when Ida hadn't heard from husband Capt. Louis Hayward for a long time. . . . Paul Henreid suffered from a throat ailment but took a treatment with sulfanilamide and was able to go back to work the next day. . . . Greatest problem of authenticity was accents. Henreid's is Austrian, Ida's is English, Miss Nazimova's is Russian. All had to be converted to Polish. Language expert Dr. Daniel Van Dragen of U.C.L.A. successfully switched them. . . Film Cutter Rudi Fehr used to work in Berlin in the same capacity by day, but worked with the underground by night. Once hid Director Curtiss Bernhardt (now also at Warner Bros.) in a succession of hotels after Bernhardt had escaped from two Gestapo agents. . . . Also in the cast is former Czarist officer Ivan Lebedeff. . . . 524 persons were employed in the scorched earth sequence, filmed at nearby Chatsworth ranch.

Republic has put its superman of the moment, John Wayne, in the lead, and what a lead it is! Wedge Donovan is a wonderful character, a hot-headed, quick-fisted Irishman who's the best construction boss in the business. Every man who works for him would also die for him. The war is in its first year, and a group of Wedge's workers have just returned from a job in the Pacific. But not all of them came back. In those days the workers were unarmed, and when the Japs attacked, the Navy, by international law, couldn't give them guns because they were civilians. Wedge flies into a rage and blames Lt. Commander Yarnall (Dennis O'Keefe), the officer in charge.

Yarnall takes Wedge to Washington with him to persuade the Navy to form combined construction and combat units. But red tape and naval protocol send Wedge into a fury again—he can't see waiting months for his men to be trained. But after he has taken a new group on a job and seen his men slaughtered by the Japs, he changes his mind. He is the first man to enlist in the newly-formed Seabees.

Meantime, Yarnall's girl, Connie (Susan Hayward) has met Wedge. At first she calls him a "stubborn impossible ape," but the next thing she knows she's in love with him. Not that she admits it, even to herself, but Wedge knows it and so does Yarnall. Just as they know that Wedge Eventually they all find themselves on a tiny, vitally important island in the South Pacific, and here the fighting Seabees really go into action. They're a tough gang and proud of it. They should be. They put up a magnificent fight and when the battle is over, the love affair is settled, too.

This is a stirring picture, with a cast that includes William Frawley, J. M. Kerrigan and Grant Withers.—Rep.

P. S.

This is the biggest epic to emerge from the Republic lot since the studio began producing pictures. . . . Camera crews toured the West Coast camps and photographed the Seabees in most every phase of their training. . . . The Navy offered complete cooperation unless shooting interfered with strict training program. Example of such interference came at Camp Pendleton when a company of marching Seabees broke for lunch at noon, and the director asked if it would be possible to have the boys do more drilling in the afternoon. The officer said it would be impossible—"this battalion is leaving this afternoon for overseas duty. You'll have to use another group." . . . Most of the cast and crew were quartered in with the men at the camp, living in strict Navy style: saluting, eating at mess and ten o'clock "lights out." . . . One consolation was the meals—complete with steaks, but-her future—she takes the way that will be best for her work. Ordinarily her dressing room door stands open. Gay, vivid, challenging, she's a natural hub around which people gather, and she likes having them around. Except when she's given new lines to learn. Then the door is shut. If you spoke to her then, she wouldn't hear you. Outside her script, the world ceases to exist.

During pictures she goes into training like an athlete. Up at six. At the studio by seven. Home 12 hours later. In bed by nine. Which leaves two evening hours for her personal life. By the time she gets her make-up off and has dinner, most of that's gone. When possible, she squeezes a walk in. Pretty tame substitute for the golf and tennis she loves, but better than nothing. Being outdoors is what she misses most. Sometimes she'll spend Sunday at her mother's beach house, and swim. The minute she finishes a picture, she's off somewhere. Generally, not taking time to remove her make-up. One-thing-at-a-time gal, that's Paulette.

Her last trip was to Mexico. As guests of the Mexican government, she and Jinx Falkenberg made personal appearances. Flying, they had to travel light—a suitcase and overnight bag apiece. All they could take were bathing suits, shorts, three changes including one extra-special dress and accessories to make the three dresses look like six.

Jinx speaks Spanish like a native. Paulette gets by, but yearns to be able to sling it like Jinx. When she gets five minutes, she plans to take lessons from her secretary, who used to teach Spanish. Fluent or not, as a good-will ambassador she rates high. In appreciation, the government gave her a house at Acapulco. It's going to be her vacation house. California's her home.

It wasn't till a year and a half ago that she bought a place of her own in Beverly. Her mother had been buying houses as a business venture and fixing them up on a budget plan for rental. Paulette's is a budget house. She saw it and made one of her snap decisions. "I'll live in this one myself and call it home."

What she fell in love with were the 20-year-old oak trees and the acre of garden. "I can practically live outdoors." Then the house itself—five rooms, and easy to take care of. She could have all her things around her—the beautiful things she'd brought back from China and Singapore. And her books—book nook . . .

She started collecting books at the age of six, with the "Wizard of Oz." She and her mother traveled a lot. She never attended the same school for more than six months, but wherever she went, the books went with her. They were the one treasure she refused to be parted from. It's a passion that's grown with the years. She reads omnivorously and has kept every book that ever meant anything to her. Two hundred are personally inscribed. When it comes to writers, she's an autograph hound—

"I've got loads of books," she told the decorator, and wondered at the funny look that crossed his face.

Later, he explained. "That's what they all say. But you're the first one that's had 'em. What I mean, loads." He scratched his head reflectively. "Want 'em all?"

"Every last one."

"You'll have to have shelves in all the rooms."

"What's wrong with that?"

So every room, including the dining room, is lined with bookshelves.

Some inspired columnist dreamed up the fiction that Paulette has a mirror set in the head of her bed. "So I can primp, sleeping, I suppose," she comments. Her mirror's in the dressing table like anyone else's, and she does less primping at home than the average woman, because she gets so much of it at the studio that it's a relief not to bother. She showers, gives her hair a stiff brushing, applies lipstick, slips into shirts and shorts or a Mexican dress, and she's set. Hates gadgets round a bedroom. Hers is done simply and restfully in gray and white gingham. Flowers from her garden are the only color accents—and on the wall, a Renoir head.

Since she was little, she's loved pictures. Since she was grown, she's wanted them. But you can't put pictures in a trunk. Her interest in them was quickened by her friendship with Diego Rivera and his wife, Frieda. Frieda's an artist, too, and Paulette owns originals by both of them. She's sat for Rivera for her portrait and posed for his murals. If you ever get to the San Francisco Municipal Center, you'll recognize her in one of the murals as the gamin and as the girl in shorts, planting a tree for the future. The man who's planting the tree with her is Rivera.

The minute she got a place of her own and freedom to do just as she wanted with it, she began collecting. And collected in her own way. No running to experts. No asking this one and the other what he thought. Paulette's an individualist of the first water. They'd be her pictures, they'd hang on her walls, she'd have to look at them. Pictures, she maintains, should be as personal as your wardrobe. They could be touted to the skies as the best examples of an artist's blue, yellow or cerise period. She wouldn't buy 'em unless she loved 'em.

art for lark's sake . . .

She spent hours in museums, learning the moderns by heart. Then she poked around galleries till she found what she wanted. There was one sure sign by which she could always tell. and it wasn't the price or the artist's name, but something that happened inside. If her heart lifted when she looked at a picture, she generally bought it. Besides the Renoir, she has Braque, Utrillo, Chagal, Dufy. Of course she couldn't always buy what she wanted. There's a Monet she'd give her eyeteeth for, but it's in a museum.

Nor did she set out with the idea of vivid colors. It just turns out that all her pictures are gay. Which is no accident, but an expression of her personality. There are times when Paulette doesn't wear red or yellow—in her accessories at least—but not more often than she can help. Just to prove she can be inconsistent, she's got one John Carroll in lovely grays. And keeps a bowl of red roses sitting under it.

She's her own meal-planner. Likes food too well to relegate that job to the housekeeper. "I could eat all day long," says she and proves it. French toast, bacon and eggs for breakfast. Roast beef at noon when the studio has it, and she takes two helpings the first time it goes by. Lobster with mustard sauce at night, and a cheese soufflé and salad and coffee. But those are only the main events. Like a kid, she's forever munching on the set. Fruit, candy bars, sandwiches—anything that comes her way. Baloney's her favorite sandwich-filling. A prop man appeared at her dressing room door one day, looking so forlorn that her heart sank—

"No baloney. Rationing." She didn't get it at first, then her laughter rang to the other end of the set. The prop man never lived it down. He now goes by the name of No-Baloney.

danger, woman at work . . .

Her interest in food at the moment is more than personal. As one of her contributions to the war effort, she's reclaiming a farm that in 30 years hasn't done a thing for its country.

The place is in Spring Valley, New York. Once it was headquarters for Mad Anthony Wayne. More recently Burgess Meredith owned it.

"Look," he told Paulette, "I'm going into the service. Either I'll just have to drop it or give it away. It's nothing but a country estate, and on what the Army pays, I can't afford it. Do you think you could do something with it?"

"Why not?" said Paulette, the indomitable. "If the Russians could do it with 50 billion acres, I ought to be able to do it with 70."

She took the train East, got a load of the place, then called on the head of the Farm Bureau for that region. Before leaving his office, she had her own five-year plan.

Put in a thousand chickens. Farm ten acres this year, five to feed the chickens. Next year, 15 more acres and another thousand chickens. Find a farmer to take over and someone to live in the house. Find a market for the produce.

She found the farmer first. He'd worked there long ago and given it up in disgust. The way he looked when she unfolded her plan, you'd have thought she was handing him a fistful of diamonds. He all but wept. "I remember when the corn was six feet high here—over your head, Miss Goddard."

She got in touch with her friend, Constance Collier. Constance had always wanted to live in the country. Would she come out and make this place her home? "Will a fish swim? I'm as good as packed now," caroled Constance.

She drove into town and made arrangements with the local merchants to take her eggs in exchange for food, gas and miscellaneous supplies. She went to New York and saw the manager of 21, who fell on her neck.

"We'll take anything you can grow and pay you spot cash."

"I'd rather have credit. You can dine me, wine me and provide me with theater tickets."

She called the head of a chain restaurant. "I'm putting in a crop of potatoes, but they won't be first rate this year. The soil's been neglected too long. It needs refeeding. Next year they'll be better, but can you do anything with these?"

"Send 'em along. We can dump them into the stew."

Her one regret was that she couldn't stay to watch her plans bear fruit. She had to get back to work.

"Never mind," said Constance, "I'll keep you in touch."

She was as good as her word. Hot telegrams sailed back and forth.

"Chickens arrived and their house not anywhere near finished. What shall I do?"

"Put them in guest house. I'll work it out when I finish this scene."

"Don't bother. Furniture out of guest house. Chickens in. Too cozy for words."

A week later: "Guest house cleaned. Chickens in own home. Laying like mad."

"My chickens," bragged Paulette.

Then there was a time when Constance went to New York for a couple of days, and the cook phoned to say that a man was painting the house. The house had just been painted to the tune of 450 bucks.

"Darling," wired Constance, "they're painting the house again. What shall I do?"

"Tell them to go away. But quick."

Constance's directions to the cook were even more succinct. "Throw the man off."

A few days later Paulette received a plaintive note from Waldo Pierce, the artist, who's one of her neighbors. "A friend of yours had what seemed a nice idea at the time. Wanted to surprise you with a picture of your house for Christmas. Commissioned me to paint it. Your cook had other ideas. Threw me off the grounds. Without so much as a hot cup of coffee—"

Cook sent him a peace offering of tomato jam—the kind 21 gets. The farmer has a helper now. In winter they cut down timber, which pays taxes. "Next year," says Paulette happily, "I'll have to have a poultry man." She's going back when she's through with "I Love a Soldier."

It's her own zest that makes things exciting for her—things other people would find dull. Welding, for instance. She went up to San Francisco ahead of the company—for a big bond rally at Oakland and to learn how to handle welding tools in the Kaiser shipyards. Most girls would have learned what they had to learn for the picture and let it go at that. She got all het up over it, bent bug-eyed over every process, fascinated by the precision and delicacy of the work. "I could do that. I'd love to do it. It's like knitting and needlepoint. I thought welders were strong-arm girls. They're just the opposite. What they do is sew the ship up."

belly grinder . . .

She presents an impersonal, practical side to the world and keeps the rest for herself. You don't catch Paulette talking about her emotions. (About the Chaplin kids, for instance, who come to the studio to see her. She had dinner with Charlie, Junior, the night before he left for camp.) But sometimes you hear a story that brings a swift revealing glimpse of the other side.

In San Francisco she went as often as possible to the hospital where our wounded men are being nursed back to health. They liked seeing people, and she was moved by the fact that they felt they knew her. "Polly" they called her.

That was on her first trip. "What can I bring you, boys," she asked, "when I come back?"

It seems they wanted a belly-grinder, which was a new one on Polly. A belly-grinder, they explained, was a concertina.

Try getting a concertina today—yeah, try. You'd give up. Me, too. Not Paulette. Paulette would be you-know-what if she'd go back without it. She turned the town upside down and bore back in triumph not a mere belly-grinder, but a big piano accordion like Phil Baker's.

In San Francisco she had to go right to work. "Will you see that this gets to the boys?" she asked a friend.

"Sure, but don't you want the fun of giving it to them yourself?"

"It's for their fun, not mine. What's the sense of keeping them waiting, so I can take bows?"

She's like the girl she played in "So Proudly," who whispered to Joan, "Don't tell Kansas I fainted."

Don't tell anyone about what goes on inside. Her heart belongs to Paulette.

IS THERE ANYONE FINER?

Dinah had to attend a broadcast rehearsal, so George—who had not yet been inducted into the Army—drove her down to the station and swelled the ranks of directors, sponsors and fellow artists making up the audience. Dinah was scheduled to sing "I Said No."

The next evening George attended the regular broadcast and listened attentively. He thought Dinah sang "I Said No" better than it had ever been sung.

A week later, Dinah was scheduled to sing at an Army camp, so George went along. After her regular numbers, Dinah was heckled by the roaring khakis until she agreed to sing an encore: "I Said No." He said "No." . . .

Two weeks later, Dinah was to appear on "Command Performance" to sing . . . you guessed it. So that night, when a group of friends dropped in and begged Dinah to sing something, George arose to the occasion to announce, "There is just one request that I must make. Please, PLEASE don't sing 'I Said No.' I can't take it . . . not even ONCE more."

However, they did have fun together. Anyone could see that. On Sunday mornings, Dinah and her three apartment-mates invited George and three other men over for breakfast. Dinah baked southern biscuits while one of the other girls scrambled eggs and a third fried bacon (if they had the points). George, who prides himself on having a chef's thumb, would prowl into the kitchen and allow himself to be put to work.

In the afternoon, George and Dinah would drive George's father and mother down to the movies. Then they would proceed to the riding stables from which the studio used to rent the horse George rode in Westerns.

Dinah practically grew up in a saddle—cavalry style. Then, when she was at the boarding school stage, she was sent to a fashionable school in New England where she was taught to ride a English saddle. She didn't like it. She suffered from a constant premonition that horse, saddle and topsoil were in a conspiracy to rob her of dignity and several square yards of important skin.

"You should ride Western saddle," George said with authority. "You'd feel perfectly secure."

She did. Thereafter she could scarcely wait from Sunday to Sunday for those long, brisk, sunny rides.

Sometimes, instead of going riding, they played tennis—a game at which George is disgustingly good. Week after week he would beat her in straight love sets, but one afternoon he seemed to be completely off his game. The tally began to read 6—4, 7—5. George rallied.

Afterward he said, "I very nearly let you lick me."

"Oh sure," observed Dinah in jeering tones. "Just you fence with me, and we'll see who gets outpointed. And if my better nature rears its ugly head, suggesting that I let you defeat me, I'll cut it off. I'm going to beat you at something!"

"My reach is longer than yours," George proclaimed defensively. "I could give you a shingle haircut."

"Try. Try."

"We-ell. Some day." But he always managed to have some other activity planned when Dinah suggested fencing.

Dinah also decided that it would be easy to show her superiority in the swimming department, but she couldn't find a pool long enough to get her masterful Australian crawl functioning at full speed. Most of the local pools are too small for racing, so their aquatic competition usually ended in a first class water fight with George having the advantage because he could catch Dinah by her shock of long auburn hair, and she was very much at his mercy. "The first thing I'm going to buy when the war is over," she would shout, trying to get away from this reverse Samson and Delilah act, "is a bathing cap."

"Lotta good that will do," spluttered George. "I'll just remove it."

One Sunday they shared a narrow escape, and George learned something about the true sportsmanship of girls from Nashville. They were driving out to the ranch of a friend, over a road that had sprung off the main highway without taking any macadam civilization with it. In some spots it seemed to be little more than a double footpath clinging to the support of the cliff with the determination of an impoverished relative. George wasn't driving fast, but some of the grades were such that it was hard to negotiate them.

As he swung around a particularly precipitous curve, the right front tire blew out. It is a lucky thing George has the muscle of a General Sherman tank because his Cadillac is heavy and it seemed to have B-17 ambitions over the canyon.

Once they had stopped, George got out. He extracted the jack from the turtleback and went to work. There is a law that no jack ever fits the car in which it is found. Especially since the tire shortage.

"I'll walk back to that little town and find a mechanic," volunteered Dinah. George was so engrossed in trying to get the whatsis released from the thingabob that he may not have heard her leave. At any rate, Dinah trudged the several long blocks back to the village and checked three filling stations without success. She was finally directed to a small garage. From there she went to the mechanic's home and interrupted a fine fricasseed chicken dinner. But she brought help to the mountainside.

When they were under way again, George glanced over at her and grinned. His shirt was a mosaic of grease and roadside dust nicely lubricated by perspiration; his face was shining, his hair fell forward over his forehead and his general aspect was extremely rugged.

But his mood was blissful. "For such a little tyke, you're very helpful," he said. "Thanks."

When, toward the end of the A-card period, the Cadillac was short of gasoline, George and Dinah usually spent an intellectual evening at home. They dote on "Ask Me Another" games, at which George is spectacularly good. He can rattle off the capital of each state in the Union; he can tell you where each major dam in America is located, what it cost to build, how long it was under construction and how much power is generated by its leashed waters.

He knows the principal crops of every state, and the agricultural problems peculiar to certain localities. A good deal of the time these mental gymnastics were just a preliminary to George's main conversational bout: a prolonged description of his ranch in Montana.

heaven, montana . . .

As far as George is concerned, the address of Heaven is Montana. It is the prettiest state, the most fertile state, the most dramatic state . . . you may add glowing adjectives indefinitely and finish them with the word, Montana.

From Alaska he recently wrote to Dinah, "The mountains in this part of the world are glorious. Almost as pretty as our Montana mountains."

In another letter he wrote, "The crops almost as fertile as Montana."

When Dinah once asked him, "Hey, what does Montana have that Tennessee doesn't?" he considered the subject gravely.

"Tell you what, honey," he came back, deadpan, "since you think so highly of Tennessee, I guess Montana can give the state a break. If your boys do a good job of fighting, why I guess Montana will take you into the Union a little later on."

One evening they were on the way to the home of a friend when some slight disagreement arose. Anyone who has ever been in love knows how those things happen; one or the other makes some trifling remark that strikes a sour note. The party of the second part comes back with a shillalah, and the battle is on.

In the midst of hostilities, they arrived at their destination. George parked, switched off the ignition and turned to Dinah in time to hear her summary, "I meet forty thousand soldiers a year. Most of them are very, very nice. I certainly don't have to put up with any nonsense from you."

George whistled. "Forty thousand!" he said in the tone of a man who has just been told that the straw hat in the window is priced at 80 dollars.

Suddenly both of them laughed. They howled. After this joyous interim, George asked tentatively, "Are we all made up?" Dinah said they were. Thereupon, they established a rule: They would never leave the car at any time, nor join a group, until all differences between them had been patched up.

About this time everyone in Hollywood began to ask George and Dinah how soon

It's awfully easy and more fun than a barrel of monkeys. But do keep score accurately if you want an idea of your Star Intelligence Quotient. The quiz offers three sets of clues, the first on this page, the second on page 80 and the third on page 91. If you can guess, on the first clue, the name of the actor or actress to whom it refers, score yourself 5 points. If you get it on the second clue, give yourself 4. And if you must turn to the third clue before guessing the name, score yourself 3. For your total score add up all 20 individual scores. 60 is average this month. For the answers, turn to page 101, but don't look before you're finished. Peeking spoils the fun.

they were going to fly to Las Vegas or Yuma. That pair were very glib in answering. They said they had no intention of marrying until the war was over. George might be sent overseas; he didn't think it fair to marry a girl, then leave her.

Dinah's reason for a non-marriage romance for the duration was nostalgic. When she should become engaged, she wanted her father to announce the fact in the Nashville papers. Then she wanted all the usual betrothal merriment: the linen showers, the lingerie showers, the luncheon for the bridesmaids, the trousseau tea, the wedding rehearsal, the white satin dress and the gracious, leisurely honeymoon. "That's for me," sighed Dinah.

For months, George had been stationed at a camp not far from Los Angeles; he was able to spend frequent week-ends in town. Then, in the fine Army fashion, he was sent, one morning, to Texas. He wrote to Dinah when he had time—which wasn't often—and he telephoned her whenever the lines were free.

It's all very well to be nonchalant about love and marriage when two persons can see each other almost every week-end, catch up on all the current gossip, have a lot of fun and return to duty refreshed and filled with memories. But when two weeks, three weeks, a month, two months roll by, friendship and comradeliness simply aren't enough. A closer, warmer tie is essential.

When George was given his 14-day furlough, he descended on Los Angeles with the speed of a P-38 heading back to base. He dropped his bags at his sister's apartment and went in search of Dinah.

Those 14 days were sheer bliss . . . plus a smattering of K.P. duty. Each evening George and Dinah cooked dinner at Dinah's apartment. Sometimes a roommate or two joined the fun, but much of the time the girls would be out on dates, so George and Dinah would be alone. One evening she was late in returning from a broadcast, so George had prepared the dinner without any assistance from the feminine touch. He had carved the roast (Dinah had saved points for weeks so as to be able to feed the man from Montana), he had made salad, he had washed the celery and prepared dessert.

"I can also sew," boasted George when Dinah exclaimed over his triumph. "They teach a guy in the Army."

After these dinners, it was understood that George would wash the dishes because Dinah had usually just had a manicure or was babying one that had to last until Thursday. She wielded the tea towel.

One night they had a discussion about the heavy gold signet ring that Dinah had given George for his birthday. Looking over some snapshots she had taken of him, she said, "You've got to stop wearing that ring. It pulls your arm down so much that, when you stand at attention, your left shoulder is two inches higher than your right. Besides, you might catch it on something and wreck your finger."

"Maybe a smaller ring would be a good idea. A double ring ceremony band."

high and dry . . .

Before a girl could ask, "Is that a proposal?" Corporal Montgomery was gone again—this time to Alaska. Days went by without a letter from George, without a call, without any word. One of the well-known contradictions of life began to bother Dinah: When a husband is away, he is still a husband. One doesn't fume over little things. One knows he will write when he can. One can plan for his return.

But when a boy friend is away, and a silence descends, a girl has plenty of time to wonder about a lot of things. Has he met someone else? Not in Alaska, surely! Since he doesn't write, perhaps he doesn't like me as well as I thought he did.

Dinah forgot about her no-marriage declarations; she forgot about having her engagement announced in the Nashville papers; she forgot about the showers, the parties, the satin preparations. So, one November morning, she and George slipped away to Las Vegas and were married in a double ring ceremony that supplied George with a simple platinum band with which to supplant the signet ring, and which supplied Dinah with a matching circlet. Several weeks earlier George had ordered Dinah's engagement, a confection of gold and rubies, not yet finished.

"When I get my engagement ring," Dinah asked wistfully, "do you think it would be O.K. for Dad to announce our engagement—in the Nashville papers?"

"As soon as Tennessee is admitted to the Union," said George.

Less than a week after his marriage, George was again dispatched on a mission. Before he left, he bought two small Christmas trees, set one on each side of the fireplace and trimmed them. It was a surprise for Dinah.

Dinah's surprise for George's first married Christmas consisted of two bathrobes, one rigidly functional for use in camp and one fawncy one for use on furlough. Also a set of pastels with which George will produce some charming landscape drawings. Also a key with a locket top in which is a tiny picture of Mrs. Montgomery. Also a wood carving set. Looks like George's artistic temperament is going to have ample opportunity to express itself when the war is over.

As everyone knows, George owns a ranch in his beloved state of Montana. The ranch is something he has fought for, dreamed of and held up to himself as the goal of his life. Repeatedly he has said that his idea of the perfect life is making two pictures a year in Hollywood and spending the rest of his time in Montana. Running cattle, raising wheat, participating in co-operatives and being able to talk things over and make plans for the future with a wife who could work with him, understanding and sympathizing with his aims.

When a friend of Dinah's asked, come Victory, what would she and George do, she said without hesitation, "We'll live on the ranch most of the time."

So it looks like real happiness ahead for Dinah and George Montgomery Letz.

I SAW IT HAPPEN

When Al Jolson toured the pup-tent and palm-tree circuit here in Africa, he did a show for our outfit. After it was over, he was kept busy autographing everything from official passes and copies of "Stars and Stripes" to letters from home. A great many of the G. I.'s held out wrinkled 5-franc notes for Al to sign. Not having any French money on me, I handed him an American $10 bill.

Al crinkled the ten-spot a moment and hesitated. He handed it back to me unsigned. "Son," he said, "my autograph isn't worth tying up this much dough. Invest it in War Bonds!" Then the Mammy singer reached into his own pocket, pulled out a crisp new five-franc bill and autographed it. He thrust it into my hands and grinned, "Here, sergeant, this is on the house!"

GREEN. With dark green wear the true reds or the reds with a blue undertone. For olive and chartreuse, choose from the yellow-red group.

PURPLE. For your purple and wine shades choose a harmonious purple-toned lipstick, rouge and polish.

BLUE. Give bright blue, French blue and medium blue extra emphasis with a blue-red lipstick. With navy the principal is one of contrast rather than harmony so wear your most flattering flaming red.

BROWN. All shades of brown take copper red, bronze and brown-y shades of nail, cheek and lip color. These browns are all in the deep yellow family.

BLACK. Again contrast is the keynote with black. Wear that bright, true red.

BEIGE. Brighten your beige costume with clear red or a tawny tangerine lacquer.

GREY. Show off grey with a flaming garnet or a bright blue-red color.

For after-dark glamour deeper blue-red and clear reds are the most vital colors. Artificial lights fade orange tones.

"MY LOVE IS LIKE a red, red rose." But to us it sounds like so much poetic license. Rouge shades that bedeck m'lady should be quite a bit paler than this florid, floral color. Some stars obtain a really natural looking flush with the help of both cream and dry rouge. The cream rouge is used after foundation is applied to create contour and illusion. Next comes a thorough powdering job. The dry rouge is then applied, after which another layer of powder is whisked over the face.

SUBTLE SUBTERFUGE. Lipstick color can be wonderous camouflage. Some actresses dote on two lipsticks in the same shade but of different intensities. The darker one is used to shadow and so decrease the apparent size of too-full lips. The lighter shade reflects the light and fills in where nature has not been generous.

The lipstick brush has become a practically indispensable tool for making the lip outline. Fill in the outline with a lipstick and carry the color well within the lips. You don't want a gorgeous smile ruined by lipstick "separatitis!"

IN THE RED. About one night a week will be devoted to putting that same red on your fingertips. These manicuring rituals are brief, but effective. Try a colorless aftercoat with your nail enamel, because it prevents chipping and injury. Keep that line-up of nail lacquer bottles in the best possible shape by adding a bit of nail polish thinner to each bottle. This will keep the polish from thickening, help to retain the original color and surprisingly enough will add a high sheen.

HUE HARMONY. Some psychologists insist that color has a lot to do with the way you feel. Yellow may make you feel right and chipper, red—gay, and blue—old. But if blue make you look like a ombination of the best qualities of Hedy amarr and Lana Turner, why we'd inist you wear it in the middle of Decemer, in May, in short—all the time! Make ome color your own. Have it tagged as etty's blue or green or purple. Choose he color and shade that does the very ost for you. Get an ensemble of makep and matched accessories to go with it.

Modern Screen Pins a Badge on You

One day long before Connie Wienk, our art editor, left for the Army, he came clumping into the office with his big feet and put something down on Henry Malmgreen's desk. He didn't say anything—just smoked his cigarette too fast.

What it was, you see illustrated above. A simple, chaste symbol of MODERN SCREEN. Connie's own way of saying "Good-by. Think of me sometimes." Connie's overseas now. And his little design has become sort of a pledge between him and you and us. We promptly reproduced it on all our stationery. But we want to do more. We want to bring Connie's design actually to life in a fine piece of costume jewelry . . . either a really heart-stopping pin or, if you prefer, a charm to dangle swankily from a bracelet.

Swanky—and sweet, too. A sweet reminder of the good times we've all had together putting out MODERN SCREEN, reading it, writing each other letters.

But here's the catch. Unless we can order thousands of these pins at one time, the cost will be prohibitive, and we'll have to scrap the whole beautiful idea. We need your help. Won't you read the coupon below carefully, then fill out just ONE part of it and mail it in? If enough of these forms are filled out soon enough, we shall be able to have our MODERN SCREEN pin—our pledge to each other and to the swell kid who's overseas!

After writing in your name and address, see how many of your friends' names and addresses you can get. Heck, there's no Ltd. after our name. Why shouldn't they be part of our gang, too!

NOTE CAREFULLY! This coupon does NOT give you the MODERN SCREEN pin. It only tells us you'd like to have one. Please do not send any money. And remember—this doesn't obligate you in any way. Since we couldn't provide space here for the slews of friends who'll probably be interested, please jot their names and addresses down on a separate sheet of paper and mail them with the coupon.

I would like the MODERN SCREEN pin absolutely free with a year's subscription ($1.50 for 12 issues) to MODERN SCREEN.

sodas the minute that school's out."

Judy didn't quite know what to make of it when the manager brought Mr. Wilkerson over that afternoon and introduced him as boss of the "Hollywood Reporter." What was the "Hollywood Reporter" anyway?

"I'd like to speak to you a minute." Obediently she slid off the stool and walked to the cigar counter with him.

"How would you like to be in pictures?"

She stared. Was he kidding? He didn't seem to be kidding. He looked like a perfectly serious man. But such things didn't happen. In fan mags they happened, never in real life, never ever to Judy Turner. How would you like to be in pictures? What could you say? Not yes—it would sound too silly. "I—I don't know," she stammered.

"Here's my card. Will you come to my office after school tomorrow? Around four?" Then he was gone. Most of the kids were busy with their own chatter, but one or two had turned to look curiously at the man who was talking to Judy.

"What did he want?"

She shrugged. "Thought I was somebody else." They were Hollywood-wise, they'd lived here all their lives. If it sounded screwy to her, how would they take it? Laugh in her face, and she wouldn't blame them.

Mother thought it was crazy, too. It took Edith to throw the whole thing into some kind of balance. She'd met Billy Wilkerson at a big party—just long enough to say how-d'you-do—but she knew about his standing in movie circles, and that he didn't ask kids if they'd like to be in pictures just to hear himself talk. "If Wilkerson thinks there's a chance," Edith said, "she'd better take it."

"But she can't go alone, and I've got to work."

"Then I'll go with her."

Judy decided she'd better look grown up. Her Oxford gray suit was the most grown-up thing she owned, but her hats all looked kiddish. So she borrowed one from Edith—an off-the-face number with just a tiny brim. And spent half an hour getting the spitcurl on her forehead just right.

In Mr. Wilkerson's office she was glad to let Edith do the talking, while she sat goggle-eyed. As a matter of fact, there wasn't much talk on either side. Mr. Wilkerson was very businesslike.

"I think she has possibilities. I'm giving her a note to Zeppo Marx, the agent. You can go up there now if you like. Let's hear how you make out. Good luck."

* * *

"How old are you?" Zeppo asked.

Judy gulped. "Eighteen."

Zeppo grinned. "Not with that spitcurl, you're not. Come on, let's have it. Sixteen? Fifteen?"

"Well—practically sixteen—"

Zeppo didn't go into dithers over Wilkinson's find. Maybe, maybe not. Certainly she didn't hit him between the eyes. ("I ought to have my head examined," he moans nowadays.) Eventually he did sign her to a contract—what could he lose?—and sent Henry Willson, one of his young men, to make the studio rounds with her. Nothing happened. Secretly convinced that her movie career was destined to be nipped in the bud, Judy continued at school and kept her mouth shut.

Till the day Solly Biano, another of Zeppo's young men, eyed her reflectively as she sat in the office, waiting for someone to take her somewhere. Suddenly he jumped up. "I've got a hunch. There's a part in Mervyn LeRoy's new picture. Come on, let's go out there."

He didn't even phone. Hustled his client into a car, drove her to Warners', steered her toward LeRoy's office.

Mr. LeRoy was busy, the secretary didn't think they could see him. At which psychological moment, out popped LeRoy, cigar in mouth.

"Can I see you?" Solly started.

"I haven't much time—"

"It'll only take a minute—"

"Well, okay, just a minute then—"

He led the way inside. Solly said, "I think this girl has possibilities for Mary in 'They Won't Forget'."

This girl, Judy thought. That's me. It sounds awful. It sounds like this necktie or this dishpan or this monkey-on-a-stick—

Mr. LeRoy was looking her up and down and around. "Well—I don't know—we could make a test, I suppose. What did you say your name was?"

"Judy Turner."

"Hm—not very good."

"My real name's Juliajean—"

"Still worse. But never mind about that. Tell you what. I'll call you, Solly."

She knew what that meant. She'd been hearing it often enough lately. Only for a minute there he did seem to be interested.

"Do you think he'll call?" she asked Solly on the way home.

"Hard to say. We'll keep after him."

They didn't have to. Things moved at a snappy clip after that, and Judy went through them in a daze. Solly calling. "Mr. LeRoy wants you to make a photographic test."

Mother saying, "Don't let it throw you, baby. Probably doesn't mean a thing."

Making the test and seeing it, thinking it was ghastly—

Mr. LeRoy saying, "I still haven't heard you read lines—"

Rehearsing a scene and shooting it—

Solly calling again: "You're in, kid. We're signing the contracts tomorrow."

Mother'd just come home from work. Moving carefully, afraid she might break, Judy held out her arm. "Pinch me, Mother—"

Mother hugged her instead, and Judy clung like a baby. "Don't let me go haywire. I'm so thrilled I can't stand it, but don't let me go haywire, Mother."

* * *

At the studio next day, they returned to the subject of the name. "I don't think Judy's right for you. Too chorine-ish," said Mr. LeRoy. "Turner's okay. A good American name. Easy to say—"

"Then shouldn't we have something very different for the first name?"

Starting with A, they went straight through the alphabet—even split names in half and hooked different halves together. Nothing worked. Finally—she'll never know where it popped from—but something popped.

"What about Lana?" asked Judy.

"Lana? How would you spell it?" She spelled it. "Lana. Lana Turner. I think that's it—" (Months after being dubbed the sweater girl, she discovered that Lana was the Spanish word for wool and decided that the hand of coincidence works in funny ways.)

Mother had a hard time getting used to the name. She'd go round the house, muttering, "Lana, eat your spinach." "Are you warm enough, Lana?" She'd introduce her to imaginary people. "Meet my daughter Lana." "Lah-na!" she'd call. "La-nah!" At last she got it. Now it startles her to hear old friends address Lana as Judy.

So the fan mags were right. Things like that did happen. Hollywood wasn't just a town with a main street. The magic door had opened for the little girl from San Francisco. She was on the inside, looking out.

What delighted her most at the studio were Miss Horn and her dressing room. Miss Horn was such fun that for once school was almost a pleasure. And the dressing room was sort of a daring little cottage with a gay windowbox and a little porch you stepped up on and a little canopy over it, and every time you went in the little door, it was like playing house.

As for the picture, she took her cue from Mr. LeRoy. He didn't seem to be worried, so she didn't worry. He was kindness itself, never barked when she got things wrong. "Take it easy," he'd say. So his calmness flowed into her.

* * *

Starry-eyed and decked out in a brand new beige outfit, she went to the preview with Henry Willson. Grandfather, who'd come to stay with them, was ill, so Mother couldn't go. This was to be Lana's first grown-up date. Henry was taking her out after the show.

Mother gave her an extra smack for good luck. "Phone me the minute the picture's over."

Talk to nine out of ten picture people, and they'll tell you they hated the first sight of themselves on the screen. That's how it was with Lana—only raised to the nth degree. As the film unrolled, she scooched lower and lower in her seat. All she could think was, "How'm I going to get out without anyone seeing me?"

"I don't feel well," she whispered to Henry just before the end. "D'you mind if we leave now?"

Outside, she couldn't talk. If she talked, she'd bawl. "I've got to phone Mother." In the phone booth she did bawl. "I was awful, simply awful. I'm coming right home." Henry couldn't dissuade her. By now she was beyond hiding her tears. "I just want to go home," she wailed.

So home she went to sob in her mother's arms.

"Oh, come on, honey, it couldn't have been that bad."

Which only started another freshet. She spent the night turning her soaked pillow and blowing her nose.

In the morning Mervyn called her. She didn't want to go to the phone, but Mother made her. "Whatever it is, sooner or later you'll have to face it."

"Seen the papers?" asked Mervyn. "Got a swelled head?"

"Yes, but not what you think. You mean the papers are good?"

"Sensational. Five years from now you'll be the biggest star in town."

For a minute, her aching forehead dropped into her palm. Then she looked up at mother. "This is the craziest business," said Lana and thought she'd made an original discovery.

Starting at a gallop, the career slowed down to a jog. Lana didn't fret. She was under personal contract to Mervyn, and Mervyn believed in making haste slowly. There were a couple of bits at Warners'.

Step by step she climbed the M-G-M mountain, on whose peaks sat enthroned such dazzlers as Gable and Loy, Tracy and Shearer. Sometimes her eyes would widen in wonder. "Not long ago I thought I was lucky to be able to see them at a Friday night show. Now I'm playing on the same lot with them."

Step by step she climbed—from the adolescence of "Andy Hardy" through "Dr. Kildare" to the dawn of glamour in "Dancing Co-Ed." Nobody said very much, but she knew she was climbing. She'd been graduated from the back fitting-room to the middle. Then—"Mother, I'm in. They fitted me in the very front room today."

Then her new contract—the wonderful day that brought her heart's desire—the day she flew home and grabbed her mother's hands and laid a kiss in each palm and cried exultantly: "That's all, darling. They've done their last permanent. Never, never again."

"Two Girls on Broadway" marked the end of a chapter and the turning of a page. Impulsively she married Artie Shaw, whose fascination might have addled an older head. Almost as swiftly, she discovered her mistake and brought their short-lived marriage to a close.

The new page was called "Ziegfeld Girl." They gave Lana the script four months ahead of time. "We're thinking of you for the part of Sheila."

She loved it from the first, though the part was small to begin with. "But I don't care, Mother. It'll be my first big production picture. Look at the people in it—Judy Garland, Jimmy Stewart, Hedy Lamarr—. And Mrs. Turner's little girl gets to play opposite Stewart."

Every day there was something to report. "The sets are so beautiful. Even the shanty bar's got class."

"They gave me a lot of new dialogue today."

"Pop Leonard's no director, he's a wizard. He gets things out of me I never knew were there."

"The part's getting bigger and bigger. Oh Mother, I'm really walking on mink."

It came out later that the front office hadn't been sure she could do the tragic Sheila, so they started it small. She had Pop Leonard to thank for the rest. He kept feeding her more, watching to see if she could take it, teaching, encouraging, giving her faith in herself because he had it.

Then he went to the front office and said, "Let me shoot the works on that kid, and you'll have a top star when the picture's done."

They said, "Go ahead."

You'd have thought Lana'd lost her best friend the day it finished. "I'll never love a picture so much. Oh Pop, can't we shoot it all over again?"

"Hold your hat, honey," said Pop. "The fun's just beginning—"

It was fun, at that. Applause at the preview. People stopping her on the lot to shake hands. Fan mail pouring in. Her name just below Spencer Tracy's on the roster of M-G-M stars—

"Only a dope would pretend it's not exciting. But I've found out one thing. You don't make yourself a star. It's all the other people—your director and hairdresser and wardrobe woman—and the grips and the cameramen. It's all the people who pat you on the back when you're nothing, and say, 'Keep the old chin up, kid. Your time'll come!' Don't let me forget that, Mother—"

Mother smiled. "You're saying what you said when you got your first contract. 'Don't let me go haywire, Mother—' "

Lana thought the experience of "Ziegfield Girl" couldn't be topped. In a way, it over every year. But when they told her she was going to be paired in "Honky Tonk" with Gable, her knees gave way. "Don't mind me," she murmured. "It's —just—all this and Gable, too." And don't think she was kidding. How could you help being nervous, playing with The King?—the guy you'd swooned over in your flapper days which, after all, hadn't been so long ago.

It was Clark himself who snapped her out of it. You couldn't go on being awed by someone who stood in so little awe of himself. "Relax, youngster," he'd grin. Or squeeze her in the ribs and say, "You feel better now?"

After one tough scene he gave her an approving wink. "You're doing it, kid." That sent her home in a glow.

"I guess it's all right," she sighed. "I guess I can be in the same room with him now without falling down—"

While she was making "Johnny Eager," she met tall, dark and handsome Stephen Crane. They were married a year later.

At the beginning, Stephen was just another boy. They knew the same people. She'd see him around at parties. Little by little it began to be more than that, till the time came when they knew they were for each other.

They were determined to keep their love for themselves. It belonged to two people—Lana and Stephen—not to the newspapers, not to the world. Nobody ever saw them together in public places. If they did go out, it would be far away from the usual Hollywood haunts. They'd take long drives—this was before gas rationing—with Lana in a dark wig, a scarf round her head. Or Steve would come to her house—the lovely white house she'd just bought for Mother and herself, high on a hill, with a white picket fence around it. And they'd sit before the fire and listen to records and plan.

Because they kept their counsel so well, the papers called it a spur-of-the-moment marriage. It was, on the contrary, carefully planned—their apartment picked out, their rings bought and inscribed. But they were bent on not letting Hollywood make a three-ring circus of it. Apart from Mother, only two close-mouthed friends at the studio were in the secret. Not till the night before they flew to Las Vegas did Lana ask Linda Darnell to be her bridesmaid—

But on Friday morning the news leaked out. Hawkeyes saw Lana and Steve board they returned was mobbed, and there was nothing to do but push their way to the car Mother had waiting and drive home with her.

"They're planning a party at the Mocambo tonight," Mother said dryly. "With the bride on the cake done up in a sweater or something equally corny."

Lana looked at Steve, and Steve looked at Lana. Mother looked at them both. "That's what I thought," she said.

So Lana packed some clothes and off they went to their apartment, where Steve's clothes had been parked for a couple of weeks. While the Mocambo quivered with expectancy that evening, wedding cake on the table and "Lohengrin" in the air, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen Crane sat cosily in their car, dining at a drive-in on Wilshire.

They were crazy in love. Their happiness was shadowed only by the universal shadow of war. After a month they did the sensible thing—moved back to the house. Mother didn't urge it, but they knew she hated rattling around up there all by herself. Besides, Steve would be called any minute now. Besides, Lana couldn't cook.

One October day she sat in a doctor's office, hands clenched to control their shaking. Like a metronome ticking in a storm, words beat against her whirling brain. "It can't be true, it can't be true, it can't be true—" She made herself say them, made herself try to believe them. "Don't let me hope," she prayed. "Don't let me hope and then be disappointed. I couldn't bear it—"

The doctor—a woman—returned from the laboratory, smiling. "It's—not true," quivered Lana. "I'm—not going to have a baby—?"

"It is true. You are going to have a baby."

Down went the shining head on the round young arms. "I can't help it," she blubbered. "It's what I've wanted all my life, and I just never thought I'd be that lucky."

She raced home to tell Steve. His mother happened to be in town on a visit. They agreed to break it to the prospective grannies together. But could Lana hold it? Don't be silly. The minute she saw Mother, out burst the news in all its glory. They told Mrs. Crane that night. The household went delirious in a quiet way.

"It's the top of everything," Lana cried. "I want to shout it to the world."

"Just whisper it," mother advised, "and the world will know."

Three months later you'd hardly have recognized the radiant girl of that evening in the white-faced figure on the hospital bed. In a more superstitious age, people would have said the gods were jealous of a joy too great. Being modern and civilized, we know the gods had nothing to do with it.

In all good faith Stephen had married, believing his divorce had gone through. The revelation that it hadn't, hit him harder, if possible, even than it hit Lana. He could stand his own pain better than he could hers.

Came the forced annulment. In January, Lana was taken to the hospital, desperately ill. Through all the anguish, she'd been sustained by one thought. There was still the baby.

Now the doctor had just left. As gently as possible she'd said, "Lana, I'm afraid we can't save the baby."

Inside Lana's head, everything crashed. Through the blackness, terrors criss-crossed like lightning flashes. Mother had all but died when she was born. Grandmother had died. With a violence almost physical, she pushed the terrors away. If she lost her baby, it would be like taking the heart right out of her, and the body couldn't live without a heart—

"Let's wait," she whispered. But there was no response in the doctor's face. The doctor didn't want to wait. That was when Lana's spirit tightened to resolve, reached for and found a strength beyond her own, a strength like rock. The words came slowly, but each was clear as a bell. "I'm going—to have this baby—if it kills me."

Through her own courage and the doctor's care, that crisis was weathered. On March 14th she and Stephen were remarried in Mexico. On the 15th he entered the service of Uncle Sam. On July 25th Cheryl Christina was born.

Still a little dopey, Lana felt the doctor's hand on her shoulder and something urgent in its touch jerked her fully awake. "The baby—!"

"She's all right—"

"Are you sure?"

"It's just that we've found her blood count's low, and we need your okay for a transfusion. Take it easy, child. There's nothing to worry about. Just a little transfusion. Just to pick her up—"

Not till the worst was over did Lana know how the doctor had sat up night after night, intent on the baby's breathing, uncertain which breath might be her last.

But why dwell on that now? At four months, Miss Crane weighed a husky 16 pounds and presented her worshipping parents with her first tooth.

* * *

Lana'd wanted a girl from the start, but didn't press the point because Steve wouldn't hear of anything but a boy—Stephen Crane IV. If it had to be a girl, they'd call her Stephanie. That was settled. Then Joan Bennett named her new baby Stephanie. Not wanting to repeat, they swept that out of the way.

"How about Cheryl? Cheryl Crane—Oh, I know, Steve— One of my middle names is Christina. Cheryl Christina Crane. I love the three Cs—"

It was Cheryl Christina Crane. Cherry for short. Right now they call her Mouse-face, Stinkypuss or whatever else seems to fit the occasion.

"The awfu' names they have for you, my poor little gairr-lie," mourns Cheryl's Scotch nurse.

These mornings Lana's out of bed, teeth brushed and face washed in nothing flat, and boom! in the nursery. If she has to go out, she goes while the baby's asleep—hates to miss any part of the daily routine, which she'll have to give up soon enough because "Marriage Is a Private Affair" starts any minute now.

Nana's day off is Lana's red-letter day. She can have the baby all to herself—to feed and bathe, to cackle over and adore. Sometimes, bending over the crib, she still can't believe it. Sometimes the baby's eyes take on a faraway look—so wise, so grave, as if she'd lived for countless ages, as if she knew things her mother would never know. Lana's heart turns over, she has to shake the mist from her head, lift the little fist to her lips, reassure herself passionately—"She's my baby—"

Steve's at home again with a medical discharge. Remind him now that he once wanted a son, and he'll tell you you're crazy. As for Mother, she's Lana and Steve rolled into one—asks nothing better than a lifetime job as slave to Cheryl Christina.

* * *

Steve and Lana have both changed. They used to like night clubs. No more.

turbed. With Cheryl at its hub, life has grown sweeter, quieter, more intimate.

Breakfast and lunch are informal meals served on trays, eaten wherever you happen to plop down. "Crane," observes his wife, "eats like a horse. So does his daughter."

Before his daughter's supper, Steve takes her dancing. It's a scene Lana loves to watch—tall man and tiny baby, one small arm curled round his neck, the other hand lost in his big paw, Cheryl gurgling to the sound of the music as Steve waltzes her ceremoniously round the room. Watching, Lana's breath catches, and she wonders if anyone's happier.

After their dinner they play gin rummy. When Steve loses—rarely—he screams like a panther—doesn't mind losing to anyone but Lana. When she loses—almost always—"Put it on the cuff," she pleads.

"Pay up, Bub," and he won't stir till she does. She's forked over a fortune in pennies.

Sometimes they go to the movies and stop in at Schwab's on the way home for a dish of vanilla ice cream—with chocolate sauce and nuts if they feel like splurging. Then they pick up the papers and new magazines and go home.

Every month they buy a War Bond for the baby. That's hers, in her own name, with her own little bank book marked Cheryl Christina Crane. No matter how flat they were, they'd never touch it. It's security for them as well as for her. It means they don't have to worry about her future. Suppose something happened to them. They couldn't bear the thought of her being lost in the world, with nothing to turn to. Or suppose she wanted to study something, and they couldn't afford it at the time. It's not Lana's ambition to stay in the movies indefinitely, even if she could. They've got to be sure that if Cheryl decides she'd like to be a doctor, she can be a doctor.

Having a baby makes all the difference. Before, 18 years just meant you'd be 18 years older. "Now," says Lana, her face lighted by some magic from within, "it means my daughter will be a young lady."

Her daughter's mother has a lovely new seriousness and poise. She and Steve have come through heartbreak into the sunlight. They don't regret the past, because they've learned from the past what nothing but their own experience could teach them—patience, forbearance and a more mature love. If there's any adjusting to be done, they meet halfway. They both hate emotional scenes. "Look, I was wrong. I'm sorry, baby—" A peck on the cheek, and they run along about their business. There's one phrase that covers the need to express deep feeling. Steve's hands go to Lana's shoulders. "I think I'll keep you for a while," he says, and their eyes say the rest.

LeRoy was right—and Wilkerson and Solly Biano. She's reached the crest. Hollywood opened its gates and its treasure to her. But gold is where you find it. Finding her dearest treasure outside the gates, our golden girl grew up.

I SAW IT HAPPEN

While visiting my aunt in Westport, my cousin, who is a policeman, walked in with a handsome young couple. "Mom," he said, "I brought home some guests who are dying for a dish of your special spaghetti." The guests, whom my cousin was to escort during their stay, were Annabella and Tyrone Power.

lets them walk to the store with her and help decide what he'll have for dinner. She's swell to them, and they'd die for her. "No other gal in the world would be good enough for Frankie," is the consensus, and to show their devotion they've organized over 100 Nancy Sinatra fan clubs, more than most bona fide stars ever achieve.

You'd think they'd get in her hair once in a while, like if she were tired or busy or something, but they apparently don't. Nancy tries to explain it to people. "All I have to say is, 'Gosh kids, Frank got in awful late last night. He's trying to get some sleep, so would you mind whipping?' or 'I'd appreciate it if you'd come back another day when I'm less frazzled.' And they vanish. That's the truth. No sulking or pleading. They simply disappear."

stardust . . .

It's amazing. The whole phenomena of Frankie Sinatra is amazing, and no one is more awed than he. Everytime he reads the raves in the press, he thinks, "Who, me?" For months after the kids took up squealing at his singing, he'd keep looking around for the other guy. "Jeeps," he'd think, "it can't be Sinatra." It's not that he underestimates himself. It's just that after five years of singing the same old way, it's kind of startling to have people stand up and cheer or fall down and swoon.

Five years is sort of a stretch to be singing at nobody in particular. You all know the story. How he started with Major Bowes. Then toured for a while and later got a job at the Rustic Cabin singing from seven to two nightly for $25 a week. Then came Harry James and Tommy Dorsey and the Paramount. It sounds swell when you say it fast, but it wasn't all laughs. They knew what it meant to be hungry, Frank and Nancy. Not just sort of, but really and truly. Every once in a while, Frank would be on the road with a show, and it would suddenly fold, paying off not one dime. Nancy would be sitting home waiting for the check and keeping alive on a can of beans. No check Monday. No check Tuesday. Finally, Wednesday—air-mail special—a fin and a scrawl from Frank: "Got this washing dishes, honey. Wonder when the voice pays off."

More times than he can count he was tempted to skip the whole racket and go back to watching football games for the "Jersey Observer," but Nancy would have none of it. And in his heart of hearts neither would he. Little things kept him going. A couple of kids at the Rustic Cabin coming back night after night just to listen to him. A guy by the name of Hank Sanicola (now his personal manager) who played hot piano and thought Frank had something good. The look on the face of Harry James the first time he heard him sing.

Now, with the world on a string, he's sort of glad he stuck with it. The voice is paying off with interest. And what, one wonders, does he do with all the chips? Confidentially, he blows it in on women. Pandas as big as a house and bracelets and indigestible candy for the little one. For the mama Nancy, so many fur coats she occasionally thinks she's I. J. Fox. Jewelry. Pocketbooks. Stuff. Last time she looked, she had a platina coat, a mink, a beaver, a lynx jacket, dozens of knockout rings and bracelets, a pocket book for every hour of every day. Everytime she opens the door, it's Frank with a package in his hands.

Zonitors ~ SO CONVENIENT

"Not another pocketbook, sweetheart—"

Contritely, "Well, yeah, Mom. But open it. This one's different."

"Frankie, I love it. It's beautiful. You're an angel."

"I'll take it back if you don't like it."

"I'm crazy for it, darling."

"I'm crazy for you." Now there's a dame who has everything.

The gift-buying trick of Frank's is nothing that's popped up since he hit the dough. Nancy can't remember a night since they've been married that he hasn't come in with something, no matter how tiny. A red comb from the five and dime or a couple of hair-ribbons. "Giving presents sends me," he used to tell her. "With some guys it's marijuana; with me, it's Woolworth's. I can't help myself."

Things to give Frankie continually stymie her. What would you give a gent with a closetful of clothes, a snaky Fleetwood body Cadillac, a beautiful watch, a million books— "You think of something, George," she heckles George Evans, who's one of his best friends as well as his press agent. George can always think of something. "How about a gold pencil. That guy never has a pencil." Or "Give him a decent cigarette case so's he's not always pushing that moth-eaten job in my face." She's given him a pen and pencil, a gold cigarette case, a gold belt buckle, cufflinks, an Atlas, and now she's worrying over his next birthday. Already she's after George. Everytime she sees him she whispers, "Have you thought of anything?"

Obviously they're sentimental as a pair of hearts on an old oak tree. They celebrate all sorts of secret anniversaries, but the best celebrations are the ones for nothing special. He'll come home some night and say, "Let's dance all over New York tonight on account of I love you," and by gad they will. Uptown, downtown, midtown. Winding up at six A.M. with breakfast at the Stork Club or at Toots Shor's on 52nd Street. They're crazy about Shor's, in spite of the invariable greeting from Toots—"Hey, slug, you gotta sing if you want to hang around my joint." That being the prelude to much hand-shaking and scrambled eggs on the house. He takes plenty kidding, The Voice does, and we do mean takes it. Grinning.

Out in Hollywood the crew at RKO had almost visible chips on their shoulders when he first appeared for work on "Higher and Higher." Their gals all had crushes on Frank, and personally they couldn't see him. His first day on the set they were distinctly cool. Just like they thought, he was only a little squirt. Nothing elaborate. "That's Sinatra," they'd mutter among themselves. "He sings." And then he did sing, and they thought, "Well gosh, he's good!" And later in the day they began talking to him and discovered he was a nice guy. By the time the picture was finished, they were calling him "jerk" and "joe" just like he was one of them, and darned if they hadn't started a new fan club.

It went like that all over Hollywood. The people who'd planned to resent him like mad fell like two-ton bombs. There were the usual press and studio parties for him, but people who didn't have to give them at all did just because they liked him. And each night he'd phone Nancy to tell her about it. "I met Mickey Rooney last night, Mom. He's a swell egg, just like you'd think he'd be . . . Hey, know something? I miss you, Butch." Or, "There was a party at the Ronnie Reagans today, honey. They have a cute little kid. Made me lonesome as hell for the baby." (Nancy Sandra is nearly four, but they can't stop calling her the baby.) "How's she doing?" She'd better be fine or her pop isn't good for a thing. If she has a cold, he's sick. His voice is lousy. She had chickenpox while he was singing at the Waldorf, and for a couple of nights he wasn't the old swoon kid at all. He was just another guy grinding out his work so he could tear home and see if his baby's temperature had gone down. When she had her tonsils out a little while ago, Nancy didn't tell him till it was all over. White-faced he heard the news—"Why didn't you tell me, Mom?" he said hoarsely, like she'd just emerged from the valley of death. "And have you murdering 'Embraceable You' all over the Wedgwood Room? That crazy I haven't gone—"

He couldn't get home from Hollywood fast enough, swell as it all was from the mob scene at the Los Angeles station to the ovation by the servicemen at the Hollywood Canteen. Incredibly—and almost uniquely, in the entertainment field—he's a home boy. He couldn't wait to put his arms around Mom again and squeeze the breath out of his black-eyed daughter. All the way out to Hasbrouck Heights he shelled them with questions. "How's Hank?" "How's Tony?" "Folks okay?" "Gee, are they enlarging the A and P again?"

"Listen, quiz kid," Nancy got in finally. "We want to hear about you. Did you see Gary Cooper?"

"Yeah, what's it to you? Oh boy, the house looks good. What's that beautiful smell?"

sunday, monday and always . . .

"Spaghetti, naturally."

He moved his pet chair back to where it used to be and flopped in it with Nancy Sandra perched on his shoulders, there to remain till somebody forcibly removed her. The effect is very much the way George Evans describes it, "Only you know it couldn't happen, you'd think that kid was part of his back."

In due time the gang began pouring in to welcome him, and by supper time everything was pretty much back to normal with the seven cronies fighting like cats and dogs over which town in Italy the Fifth Army was in that day. The seven include Frankie, of course, Axel Stordahl, who's his music arranger; Mannie Sachs, recording chief for Columbia Records; Milton Axst, a Philadelphia manufacturer; George Evans; Hank Sanicola; and his cousin, also called Frank Sinatra, who's the jack-of-all trades of the set-up, a combination chauffeur, handyman and doer of odd jobs. He gets spells of feeling very unworthy of his name. "Look, cuz," he keeps saying. "I'd be glad to change it. I'm only a mug and—" Frankie shuts him up right there.

"We're a couple of mugs, so what?" So nothing, till the next time. The gang calls him Junior or Ruggles, and he's a vital member of the clique. Junior's a fast man with a joke. Hank is the serious one. Frankie's the current events expert. He knows what cooks in the Senate every hour of the day. Keeps enormous maps in his den with the progress of American troops marked on them with pins.

That night, like almost every night, they sat up till all hours, talking, laughing their heads off, arguing. Was James better than Goodman? Would Louis still be tops after the war? Would Germany be defeated this spring? Like almost every night, they lost their tempers, especially Junior. Senior doesn't lose his so much any more. Not with his friends at least. This past year he's lost it publicly just twice, but a lot of people won't forget what he's like when he's mad.

One of the times he was driving through Central Park with George en route to singing at the Flag Day celebration. Some kids saw him, and pretty soon dozens of them were swarming over the running board and sticking their heads in the window. "Hi, Frankie—"

"Hi, kids. Better watch it, you might get hurt." Before they could disband, the cab driver grabbed one of them and smacked him. Frank got out of the car, those wild eyes of his blazing. "Look, Mac," he told him, "that kid didn't do anything." The driver gave the kid another good hefty shove, whereupon Frank hauled off and socked him. Sure it was a crazy thing to do—they can jug you for less—but none of the other joes standing around lifted a finger, and the kids just screamed their thanks.

"I'd skip that kind of stuff if I were you," George said quietly, after they'd started off again.

"Yeah? Well I wouldn't. They can't push those kids around." Since then, they haven't.

he's funny that way . . .

The second time he got mad, it was a beautiful thing to see. It happened at the Waldorf's Wedgewood Room toward the end of his show one night. He was singing "She's Funny that Way," and the lights were low, and everyone was quiet—except this one ringside table. There was much chuckling and chatter, and finally one of the men said quite audibly, "You stink."

Frank asked for some lights, and he walked across the floor to the table. His gang sitting on the other side of the room looked at each other and were scared of what was coming. "This'll look good in the tabloids," Ruggles whispered to Hank.

"I'm a Hoboken boy myself," Frankie told the table of white ties and decolleté gowns, "and in Hoboken we have a name for guys who take shots in the dark. Here at the Waldorf, I guess they'd call them cowards. Where I come from we call them yellow-bellies. Now that we've got some lights on, I wonder if you'd say that again." The men at the table were looking at their plates, and no one said a word. Frankie just stood there, a slim boy with a damp lock of hair over his forehead, and gave them time to think. "Look, gentlemen," he went on quietly, "you don't like Sinatra. Okay, plenty of people don't. They go hear Dwight Fiske or Benny Goodman or someone they like. They're not stupid enough to come in here and pay their good money to be bored. But most of these folks came in here tonight to be entertained, and I'm doing my job as well as I can. They pay me a lot of money for singing here, enough so that I could buy and sell this whole table, but not enough to make me take cracks from hecklers." He was a little bit out of breath, and there was a thin white line around his mouth as he finished. Nobody at that table had anything to say, but hell broke loose in the rest of the room. It was Armistice Day and New Year's Eve and the home team making a touchdown with seconds to go all rolled into one. For ten good minutes they cheered, and the gang at the table across the room breathed again. The crowd needn't have taken it that way. They might have booed him off the floor. "That darned kid," said George proudly.

Normally, he's a sweet, good-natured kid, eternally patient with the autograph-demanding fans, even with ones who pull his handkerchiefs out of his pocket or yank buttons off his clothes. "You can buy new clothes," he says, "but you can't buy that." "That" being the kids' devotion.

Which brings us back to the kids again. After all, it's their fabulous attendance at his shows that'll gross him a million bucks in 1944.

Here are the facts. There are over 1,000 fan clubs in his honor and he receives 3,000 fan letters each week. Everywhere he goes, Boston, Pittsburgh, New York, he's mobbed. Take Boston. When Frank landed at the Back Bay Station at 5:45, December first, the kids almost tore the place down. They blew their all on cab-fare trailing him to the Copley-Plaza. They waited patiently till he got through a press conference. Every morning for a week they began lining up at 6 A.M. outside the theater where he sang. Popular? He's the biggest thing since Mickey Mouse.

that's him . . .

How come? Well, you have to actually see and hear him to get it. You miss a lot on the radio and on records, but in the flesh it mows you down. Part of it is the "bend" in his voice, like when he makes about three syllables out of the "you" in "Embraceable You." The rest of it is the glint in his eyes, the shy delivery—oh heck, you can't describe it. There's no name for it, because it's never happened before.

The most unsurprised person about it all is wife Nancy. She knew it would happen. Just didn't know when. So proud of him she can't see, she covers it up by joshingly calling him "you big celebrity" intermittently with "swoon boy." Neither of them have taken it big. Their house isn't even slightly plush. Interviewers are always asking what period it's done in, and Frankie just gapes at them. "Gosh, it's just a house," he says. "Brick and field-stone. And inside, it's —well, chintz and stuff." After they've gone he mutters, "Period, hell." That stuff bores him stiff.

Frankie and Nancy continue to live like an average middle class couple. The things that mean happiness to both of them would still be around if he were making 50 bucks a week. The house, the kid, his gun collection, their famous spaghetti parties, the plans for the new baby. (Still unborn as we go to press, but definitely a boy according to Frankie. His wife cautiously calls it "It," but Pop calls it either "Francis Sinatra, Jr." or "My Son.")

There's just one thorn in the whole swell set-up, and that's his draft classification. It's not that he's not glad that he'll be home with his family. He can't even kid about that, it's so wonderful. It's just that sometimes he feels so damn futile in his tweed jacket and bow tie, when there's a lot of spare khaki around. It's just that sometimes he'll see a sailor with a string of campaign ribbons but minus an arm, and he won't want to look him in the eye.

The gang ribbed him about it at first. "Punctured ear drum, eh, Bud? Too much Sinatra, that's what." For once, no comeback. Just, 'Aw shut up will you?" That wasn't like Frankie. The kid was low.

He may be 4-F in the Army, but he's still 1-A in the gals' hearts. By actual count, one out of every third female is a fan. You only hear about the spectacular ones, but there are thousands more blushing unseen. Like the little WAVE at Hunter, where he sang not long ago. After he'd finished, she turned woozily to her chum and said, "I'm not the swoony type, but if I were, boy, would I!"

Boy, us too.

LOVABLE LUG

stay and have dinner with us?" invited the lady of the house, warmly, and Sonny grinned, "Sure!"

By the time they left late that night, the total and slightly hostile strangers were bosom pals and calling each other by their first names!

The funny part is—Sonny Tufts, by all rights, should and could be as snooty as Mrs. Astor, because he's from one of those fresh-off-the-Mayflower Boston families who can talk to the Cabots and Lodges and God, too, any day around his home diggin's. His Boston Brahmin ancestors landed in 1638 and founded Tufts College, and there's been a male Tufts in Harvard almost every generation since old John H. founded the joint. But Bowen Charleston, III, is a blue-blooded rebel—a friendly, democratic guy who gave Back Bay the back of his hand, socially speaking, years ago and will still have no truck with the social zoot-snoot, in any shape or form. In fact, he adores to boob it.

Like the time a few weeks ago when he and Barbara were camping in a motel down Malibu way, and Sonny took his nightly stroll up the Coast highway to a roadhouse to swill a friendly beer with his pal the barkeeper. At the bar, he ran into a group of visiting Easterners who recognized him at once and cornered him with a barrage of broad A's and veddy, veddy high-toned talk until the atmosphere became very enervating.

They played "Do You Know" all around the bluebook names of Boston and finally asked Sonny where in the world he was staying in this—er—outlandish—er—queer—er—frightful place, Hollywood.

"Oh, right down the road," said Sonny, "at the estate of a rich friend of mine."

The eyebrows went up as he described it. "Magnificent place . . . acres and acres of ground—dozens of rooms, scads of servants . . . vast swimming pool. We occupy the West wing, off the North gate . . . Place is always chock-full of guests . . . really top-hole, old top."

At that, the socially impressed Bostonians' eyes popped, and Sonny could tell they were simply dripping to get a gander at this princely estate where he lolled in luxury. He resolved that they should. So when they offered to give him a lift home, he accepted warmly, and when they pulled up beside a glaring neon sign that shouted "Malibu Motel," he hopped out nimbly. "This is it!" he said. "Wonderful place, isn't it? Look at that pool." He pointed to the Pacific Ocean. "All those rooms. (The cabins). Well, I'm off to the West Wing. Always full of guests. Always full. Ho-ho. Well, good night, good night."

He didn't look back, but Sonny thinks they finally got the car into gear and the heck out of there. They didn't say much of anything, though.

Sonny's such a big, good-natured kid himself that he can't imagine anyone getting mad at a prank like that. He's taken an awful beating himself, by the way, since he came to Hollywood, chiefly because no one can get his goat, and as a result he has expanded his friends in every direction.

Sonny has never made any bones about the fact that he's green as grass in movie savvy, and he pestered Paulette Goddard so much on the "I Love a Soldier" set about how to do this and that, that Paulette finally hung up a sign on her dressing room, "Information Bureau for Sonny Tufts." When he was making "Government Girl" at RKO with Olivia de Havilland, Sonny was slumped in a chair on the set one day reading a Hollywood newspaper column. Suddenly he whistled.

"It says here," read Sonny, "that Alan Ladd gets 7000 fan letters a week! Don't you think," he asked guilelessly, "that's a little exaggerated?"

Olivia picked it right up. "Now don't you get worried, Sonny," she soothed, in a motherly tone, made for small boys. "One of these days, you'll get 7000 fan letters a week, too!"

"Aw, now," Sonny grinned, but Olivia kept on kidding the gag along. And that afternoon in popped a Western Union messenger boy yelling for Mister Sonny Tufts. Sonny had forgotten all about the morning kidding.

"I got some mail for you!" said the messenger boy.

"Okay," smiled Sonny, "just bring it in here."

"You mean—" cried the boy, "the whole truck load?"

"Truck load," gasped Sonny. Then he caught on when the cast all laughed. But he didn't even blush or stammer. He just joined right in with loud, typically Tufts "Ho-ho-ho's."

laughing boy . . .

A big six foot four, 200-pounder could get mighty mad and rough up the place very often if he had a touchy temper around Hollywood. But Sonny has that easy-going, unruffled disposition that's made in Heaven and tailored to be a laugh target. When he was living in the Malibu auto court, the studio called him one day, and the confused court manager said, "No, Miss Tufts isn't here—she's just left." They ragged him about that "she" stuff for days, but Sonny didn't even get halfway het up about it.

One of the funniest tales they tell on Tufts, for my money, though, was his first screen test at Paramount, the one that landed him his break in "So Proudly We Hail." Remember, nobody in Hollywood knew Sonny Tufts from Adam when he came out. He was looking for Hollywood fame, but Hollywood definitely wasn't looking back. A rich Eastern friend staked him to expenses, and another pal said he'd introduce him to the studios. How Sonny ever got any attention at all is a small miracle because this last pal simply shoved him into the office of the Paramount casting director and said "He wants to be in the movies"—like that. Ordinarily, they'd have called the studio cops, but Joe Egli refrained because something made him look twice at Sonny—and he's right glad something did. Yes, indeed.

Anyway, even if he looked good, they just couldn't hand a raw beginner a big league part in a big league picture without taking a few feet of test film. So Mark Sandrich, the director, led Sonny on to the test stage and indicated a stack of standard test scripts.

"You know what you can do best, Tufts," he said, "Pick something out, and we'll do it." Sonny riffled through the scripts. He wanted something funny because he figured comedy was his strong point. He saw one he thought ought to be just about right. It sounded funny enough to him. He thought it sounded a little familiar, too. But he said, "I'll do this one."

Well, they made the test, and everybody on the set, except Sonny, looked a little baffled. But he was clowning through it and having the time of his life. The next day Mark Sandrich ran off the result. When it was over, Sandrich took a deep breath. "Well," he exploded, "If this guy is serious, he's the greatest ham ever born. But if he's not—he's a really marvelous

Only after Sonny was all signed up, did they tell him that the "comedy" part he'd picked for his test was just the tenderest, most touching love scene that Charles Boyer had made with Irene Dunne in "Love Affair!"

Pointing that out to a real ham would be like waving red flannels at a Spanish bull. But to Sonny it's funny. Even funnier than usual—because the joke's on him.

Maybe because Sonny Tufts doesn't take himself too, too seriously is the reason he has such a golden disposition and such a swell time out of life. Ever since he came to Hollywood, a lot of things that would completely throw the average pouty Hollywood star hasn't bothered him one bit—for instance, the housing situation. Sonny arrived just when spare living quarters vanished; that's why he bunked around in auto courts. He did try this swanky Beverly Hills hotel for a while, but it made him uncomfortable, especially since then he wasn't earning any sugar. But when he said he had a marvelous place to live at Malibu, he wasn't altogether kidding the Eastern swells. He really enjoyed it, because a guy like Sonny can enjoy almost anything.

For one thing, he goggle-fished and swam in the Pacific every day, hiked in the Malibu Hills and rigged up his old racing bike, so it would make 40 miles per hour and pumped it back and forth from Hollywood—a 30-mile round trip. That, by the way, was while he was making "So Proudly We Hail," and of course for the Bataan scenes he had to let his hair grow and sprout a beard. Wheeling back and forth in the sun, stripped down to shorts, he got tanned as a football, and once a lady tourist stopped him on Sunset Boulevard and inquired, "Mister—are you this Peter the Hermit I've read about?"

The Tufts live now in a small 2-bedroom house in Bel-Air, but they still haven't a telephone. The house they finally found is one of those decorator's gems, owned by an arty gentleman who went in for classic decorations. At first Barbara, Sonny's wife, balked when she saw all the marble busts and statues parked around. "Oh no," she protested. "Sonny couldn't live here. Why he's always knocking things over. He'll ruin the place." They finally agreed to store most of the objects of art away. Now only two busts are around, and Sonny hasn't busted either one—yet—although he grabbed one the other night just as it was tottering.

Barbara looks after the care and feeding of Sonny, and she's another authority that Sonny has the world's best disposition. Hers is pretty good itself. She was well along in an interpretative dancing career when she became Mrs. Tufts. From that minute, though, she decided Sonny was going to be the only career person in the Tufts family. Now Barbara doesn't do anything except keep house and be Mrs. Tufts, which is a job she says she likes a lot.

Barbara, tall, dark and Spanish looking, is a Fresno, California girl (Barbara Dare), who met Sonny in a New York show. Her best friend introduced her to Sonny, and her best friend was Sonny's best girl. So they got engaged right away. And typically, both she and Sonny are still good friends of the girl who lost out!

There aren't any children in the Tufts household, but there's a macaw named "Waca" who's just about as much trouble. Barbara found "Waca" down in Mexico on a trip before she met Sonny. He's a beauty and is supposed to live to be a hundred years, and be worth $150, although Barbara got him for $5.

You might possibly be getting the idea, along about now, that Sonny Tufts is an amiable young gentleman to whom almost anything can happen, and often does. If so, you've caught him right on the button. Nobody in Hollywood can be as relaxed about himself, complexless and as frank about his foibles and failings, either. If he weren't so darned honest, one of those movie superman legends could be rolling right along by now. But Sonny happily squashes everything an ardent press agent dreams up about him.

bench-ridden tackle . . .

For instance, somebody tagged him an "All-American at Yale." "Ho-ho" laughed Tufts when he heard that. The truth was, he allows, that his coach, Adam Smith, once called him "the best waiting tackle in college football"—because he was always waiting around on the bench to get in the game. Fact is, Sonny was just fair—oh well—really not very good at football. Somebody else once tagged Sonny as a "college rowing champ." Well, he did row—shell and single sculls—and wear a crew haircut, too, but his outfit was the third team—not the 'Varsity—he'll point out to you, if you give him half a chance. Sonny Tufts was a persistent, if not brilliant athlete all through Phillips-Exeter Academy and Yale. (He crossed up the family by picking Yale instead of Harvard, just to be different—and it so surprised the dean at Yale that he cried, "What are you doing here?" when he saw a Tufts on his roster.) In fact, Sonny Tufts got so fed up with organized sports that the only things he's not allergic to today are swimming, skiing, biking and such unorthodox events. But Sonny was never a whiz—and when he volunteers that information, you want to hand the guy a Carnegie medal or something!

Another thing he'll break down at the drop of a hat is the idea that he is a Horatio Alger go-getter, who has been rowing his own canoe since he was in knee pants. "Gosh," says Sonny, "if my Dad hadn't been a wealthy banker, I guess I'd still be in Europe!" It's true he used to wander all over in the summer time aboard cruise steamers with college bands he'd organized. But there was usually a time when Papa had to heed a quick cable and come through with some cash. Only once did the cable rescue treatment fail. That was when Sonny missed his boat in Naples, missed it again in Cannes, again at Barcelona and finally at Lisbon. He didn't want his family to know he was that dumb. Also the time he dropped 80 hard earned smacks at Monte Carlo and was ashamed to hit the family for what was obviously a chump trick. Both those times he came back to Boston as a "workaway" which is just one step above a stowaway, the difference being they pay you a cent a month and don't toss you in the clink when you dock.

To this day, Sonny cheerfully admits he doesn't yet know the value of money and is inclined to spend it as fast as he makes it. But he's also quick to point out this isn't his family's fault. Although wealthy, Tufts, Senior, did the best he could to make Sonny learn the value of a dollar. For instance, when Sonny decided to be an opera singer and study in Paris, his Dad came through with all expenses—except one item. He insisted that Sonny had to do something to help himself, so he decided he'd have to work his way abroad and Sonny obliged. Even as a kid, while he had plenty of squander money in his trousers, Sonny always had to pick dandelions, mow the lawn or go through the motions of earning a little. Once, after he'd grown up, too, and was in college, his Pop tried to teach him a business lesson.

That was when Sonny booked one of his dance bands into a big hotel, then merrily forgot all about following up on the deal. When he finally called around, he found some other smart operator had walked right in and got the job. "Let this be a lesson to you" said his Dad. "You can't get anywhere unless you attend to business."

"I can get another hotel easy," boasted Sonny.

"Yep," said his Dad, "no doubt. But you aren't. You're going to spend the summer selling ice boxes. I've already got you the job. Maybe a real job will teach you something about what it means to earn a dollar."

de-icer . . .

Well, believe it or not, Sonny actually got himself into a go-getter salesman Sam mood. He took on a lean district in the refrigerator sales set-up. He had no car. He canvassed house-to-house. It was in the depth of the Big Depression. And he sold more darned ice boxes than the other 100 salesmen the company had and won a prize! He's still got the loving cup to prove it. Only when he regards it now, he winces slightly. He came through—but he didn't really learn the lesson his father wanted him to. Selling wasn't tough for Sonny; with his personality, it was fun. He still doesn't know what it is to earn a tough dollar—and he admits charmingly he doesn't want to find out!

Today Sonny is still such a terrible businessman that Barbara handles all the money affairs. She has to watch Sonny on various items because he still can't quite figure out what he needs and what he doesn't, and what money has to do with it. Right before he came out to crash Hollywood (and he did!), Sonny went in hock for a slew of Benham tailored suits that set him back—well, never mind, plenty. There were eight of them, to be exact, and so far he's worn a couple of them about twice. They never had a thing to do with crashing Hollywood, by the way.

$10 for 10%

There may be a wonderfully dramatic story in that packet of bonds lying in your dresser drawer. A story of small sacrifices and big ones. We want you to tell us about it. We want to know just how you're managing to scrape together over 10% of your weekly salary or income for War Stamps and Bonds. And why? What, specifically, keeps nudging you on? Tell us, and if your letter is selected as the prize-winning one of the month, we'll send you $10 in war stamps. Address your letters to MODERN SCREEN, 149 Madison Ave., New York 16, N. Y.

This month's prize-winning letter:

I used to wonder how a $150 secretary who lived alone and sent money home could boost herself into the 10% bracket? I was already giving $7.50 per month vacation money. But one day a brain wave struck. What about my monthly rent? Why not slice that? Finding a suitable room convenient to my office required patience, but finally I succeeded. "You're happy now," a voice seemed to say, "but wait! You're going to miss all the nice things you're used to." But that voice was weak. I hardly heard it at all because I was thinking of how much those brave soldiers, sailors and Marines were giving up . . . and how good it would be to have them home again.

Elizabeth Forbes,
Chicago, Ill.

Then when he went back to New York to appear with "So Proudly We Hail," he figured that success ought to let him splurge a little. So he took a dozen silk pajamas at Sulka's, and what that bit him for was scandalous. So far, he hasn't had a pair on, either—sleeps, as usual, in an old T-shirt—and no bottoms.

The truth is, that all Sonny really cares about—or has for more years than he realizes, is entertaining people. At Exeter and Yale he took all sorts of weighty subjects—majored in anthropology and Greek. But the Sonny Tufts legend that still lingers around New Haven has little to do with scholastic honors. They remember Sonny, I suspect, mainly for his funny business on the comic magazine, the Record, his four or five dance bands, the glee club—and the crew and football and athletic stuff—all of which college profs are wont to call "extra-curricular activities."

It really started long before that, Sonny suspects. Because he can remember being taken as a mere brat to a matinee in Boston by his dad. When they walked out, Sonny blinked into the sunlight and spoke up.

"Would you mind if I did that when I grow up for a living?"

"Do what?"

"Act on the stage—entertain people."

He remembers his father's face when he considered it gravely. Everybody knew he wanted Sonny to follow him in the investment business.

"N-no," he finally said. "Not if you were good."

Sonny never forgot that, and there was a time when he took it so seriously as to train for an operatic career. That was after he met Tito Schipa on one of his twenty-odd Atlantic crossings. That was also the famous time when he checked his drums at Grand Central Station before he hopped a train to Boston and tore up the claim check, just so he wouldn't fall back into what was easy. Fortunately Sonny realized his operatic limitations early, and today mostly what he retains of the operatic studies in Paris are his love for French customs and cooking (he's a real gourmet in the food department and a connoisseur of wines, and if he could afford it, all he'd drink would be champagne). He can still rattle off opera tunes, though, and when any music critic sounds him out, as a San Francisco newspaper interviewer did when he was making "I Love a Soldier" there on location, Sonny can toss big music and opera stars and arias back and forth with the greatest of ease.

But the lighter forms of music and entertainment are his meat, as he realized quite a while ago. And he doesn't look on these as hard work. In fact, whether he's before a camera or not, Sonny is usually giving out some of his famous impersonations (a pip is his idea of the difference between a Yale, a Princeton and a Harvard man) or doodling on some musical instrument that's handy. He can play them all, trumpet, trombone, sax, drums, piano. When he and Barbara lived on 52nd Street in his New York night club days, Sonny just couldn't make it to bed before four or five A.M. There were so many jam and jive joints handy. He'd barge in the Famous Door or the Onyx, Jimmy Ryan's or some place, and whatever hot leader was there, Stuff Smith or Count Basie or somebody would yell, "Hello, theah, Sonny Boy—come sit in!" So Sonny would sing and play all for free until they swept him out. He just likes to work, when the work is entertainment.

Hollywood doesn't afford such temples of tempo, which is a good reason why Sonny and Barbara haven't paid much mind to Hollywood night life. Another good reason why is that Sonny is busier than a tailgate trombonist in a circus parade since he clicked so terrifically. But when they have an evening with friends, nobody sits around playing cards or parlor games. Somebody is always singing, telling jokes, playing or acting up. And pretty often that somebody is Sonny. Of course he sings in the shower.

This Christmas, too, he up and bought himself a present—a set of drums. It was Sonny's idea; but Barbara heartily approved. Sonny was taking out his natural rhythm on the chairs and tables, rapping expensive crystal with spoons and such. She thought a set of drums would be safer.

Barbara calls Sonny "Bambi," because once in his night club days he had a comic Bambi number. What Sonny would do without calm and capable Barbara, Heaven only knows. Besides managing his business affairs, she coaches him on all lines and rehearses with him at home. She wakes him up in the morning and gets him off. Once lately when Barbara was sick with a cold he snored till almost noon when he was supposed to be at work. They presented him with a mammoth Big Ben alarm clock on the set next day and they weren't kidding.

Usually an icy shower—the only kind he ever takes—snaps Sonny wide awake and up and at 'em. The busy program Paramount has cooked up for him is enough, Sonny thinks, to keep him from getting fat, even if he is hovering around the thirty-year mark, when athletes tend to take it on. He likes to exercise when they give him a day off, but when he does, it seems he manages to get banged up.

The other day he had a brief vacation, and he took his bike out on the highway and started racing automobiles. It was easy, because he can tear around at 40-miles per hour on it, and cars are supposed to keep down around 35 these war days. But he got hold of a scoff-law speeder who hopped it right up to 50, and trying to handle him shot Sonny off into the dirt in a header. He arrived bandaged up like a walking first aid lesson at Paramount.

In fact, it's his talent for almost getting himself killed that keeps Sonny Tufts in Hollywood today. He's out of all possible Army service along with the rest of the 4-F Charlies—the big bruiser—all because he sailed off a high cliff back East on some slippery skis one winter and wrapped himself around the business end of a pine tree. That cracked his pelvis—and what with all the other sprung joints, cock-eyed bones and spavined vertebrae Sonny has hanging around from a life-time of such didos, the Army doctors inferred he'd be good for glue—but that's about all.

His younger brother, David, is taking care of the Tuft scrapping in this war as a naval lieutenant aboard a destroyer escort, and Sonny is pretty proud of the "kid"—who is all of three years younger. He thinks, in fact, his bud has done very well, considering that he's a Harvard man.

This doesn't exactly mean though that Bowen Charleston Tufts, III, is strictly safe from harm for the duration. Since he became a Hollywood star, Sonny figures his insurance policy may have to be re-written. Not in all his escapes and escapades did he run across like what he ran across when he went back home to Boston as a star with "So Proudly We Hail."

First of all, cops whipped him about New England at 90 miles an hour with sirens screaming to make bond rallies here and there, until his taffy hair started turning gray. Then the autograph wolves stormed him outside the Metropolitan Theater, and they snuck up behind him whenever he'd go in or out of the hotel. It was a new kind of attack to Sonny, and for about the first time in his life he almost came down with a case of nerves.

In fact one evening when a gang of home town moppets spied him, Sonny was so surprised and terrified that when he tried to sign autographs his hand looked like a jumping Jeep on a rocky road. Finally, he had to admit defeat and give up.

Whereupon a hard-bitten urchin snorted in disgust.

"Cheez—is dat guy dumb! Lookit, the big dope can't even write his own name!"

That's not exactly true. In calmer moments, Sonny Tufts can write his name all right. On some very nice Paramount

COLOR CHART. When choosing your fingertip color, aim for a shade that harmonizes with the general color scheme of your wardrobe. First, take inventory. Are you a gal who goes for sport clothes in, say, rusts, browns and yellows? Then you'll be pleased with the effect of an orange tinted polish or a deep shade of mahogany that's especially good for evening wear. Should you be the sophisticated sort who wears black and more black, then a clear, true-red will add a chic note to your togs. We could go in this vein, but the whole color picture is ably handled in an article called (surprise!) "The Color Picture" on page 60. Don't miss it.

GLAMOUR TIP. Here's an intrigue-tip that's bound to bring a compliment from the boy next door. Paint a colorful design on your wooden or metal pieces of jewelry in the same shade as your nail polish. Or cover the buttons of last year's dress with a gay shade of enamel. The brush that comes with your polish will do the trick. You can change or remove the color completely with your polish remover.

HAND-Y HINTS. Suppose your favorite shade of nail enamel becomes thick and hard to apply. Simply hie yourself to your local cosmetic counter and purchase a handy bottle of polish thinner. Add a small amount to your old polish and, quick like a bunny, you've a brand fresh bottle of the stuff in no time. Economical, too!

Should your pet fingernail crack or break part way, worry not. Remove the old polish, patch the break with adhesive cellophane tape and trim off the edges. Apply a new coat of polish, and no one will ever guess your tragedy. If perchance, the nail should break completely, slip on a new fingernail. You can buy a package of six nails for a thin coin and, praise the Lord, you'll have no more worry about broken nails spoiling the appearance of your hands.

RECONDITIONING. So you haven't any help, and the house has to be cleaned. Well, pitch in, my pretties, and let's see how good a job you can do. Only don't let Joe Gremlin help you. He's the guy who splits your fingernails and leaves your hands rough and chapped. Scare him away by taking advantage of the many fine hand lotions that have no other purpose in life but to keep your mitts smooth and satin-like. Keep a bottle of your favorite lotion on the kitchen shelf, one in the bathroom and one in the laundry. If you're an office-working gal, stow a bottle of the lotion in your desk drawer. Use it each and every time your hands are in water. You'll notice the bright results almost at once.

If your job involves some extra greasy handling behind the production line or even cleaning the home attic, smooth on a protective hand cream before doing the job. This forms a thin, protective, film-like glove and guards your hands against dirt and grime. When the task is finished your hands are smooth and unchapped!

Frequent soap and water scrubbings are also Gremlin chasers. Be sure to dry your hands thoroughly, though. A rich emollient cream smoothed on your hands at night relieves any roughness.

HANDSOME HANDS. Hands that are comfortable naturally lend charm and poise to your appearance. Give your digits some extra care in Jack Frost time. Remember, they lead an active life and need special handling this season. Show them off . . . and make sure it's to their advantage!

to wait for mail-call. V-mail's practically wings for your letters.

NO MORE LONG FACES: Yep, he's gone, and the wonderful, giddy world you two shared isn't around any more. It's no fun seeing a movie, 'cause his khaki sleeve isn't right next door to nudge at the funny parts. It's no fun working, 'cause he's not there to be your listening-post. . . . That's how it'll be for awhile, lady, and we know it's grim. However, there's one thing for you to remember. No one can lift you from those awful depths but you.

The first step up is a change of routine. If the day's high-point used to be six P.M., and his key in the lock, arrange to have dinner at 5:45 so that, come six, you're too busy gorging to look at your watch and remember. If your day really got going around 8:30—when he dropped around—be sure your evenings are jammed to the gills. See the old gang as often as possible. Always have a pair of socks or a sweater "in the works" for him. Keep a diary and send him the pages every week. Be just too darned busy for doldrums. Sometimes, we know, nothing in the world will help but a good sob session. Succumb if you must, occasionally, but keep it between you and the pillow.

NO MORE MOONING AROUND BEING FAITHFUL: So you told Bob you wouldn't sit under any apple trees for the duration, and you don't honestly want to—but gee, you do hate being the compleat recluse at your age. Well, look. Don't be. There are ways. Throw yourself on the mercy of some couple you know well. Get them to take you to an occasional dance. Once you get started dancing, they can wash their hands of you—until going home time. Don't ever get talked into leaving with some other guy. His brother is probably Bob's tent-mate in New Guinea. Yeah gal, infidelity gets around. Go to USO dances. Whip to the movies with Bob's kid brother. Keep moving, but strictly as Bob's girl.

NO MORE DARK SUSPICIONS: You haven't seen your man in 16 months, and in your saner moments you know he's being true to you, but there are times when you visualize him carrying on but high with some flashy WAC or swooning over a Navy nurse. Guess it's woman's nature to be suspicious, but believe it or not, it's man's nature to be faithful to the woman he loves. Your problem, as we've already said, is to keep him crazy for you via V-mail. You know how. Cute snapshots, reminiscences, chatter about when he comes home, news of his chums, and of course, leave talk galore. Just for the record, you have very little competition from WACs or nurses or anyone else. The boys in New Guinea rarely see any but native women, who are anything but attractive. This goes for almost any of the spots in the South Pacific. On their precious leaves in New Zealand or Australia, the Red Cross tells us that good food, cold beer and the latest jive records are more on their minds than infidelity. Sure, they'll probably dance with some gal at the Red Cross club, but you know what they'll talk about? You. The color of your hair, the way you laugh. You're what they're thinking about, dreaming about, longing for every second, and that's no bull. The occupation forces in Sicily and Italy are so busy that there is little time for flirtations, even if they did know what the girls were talking about.

We've no doubt there'll be some romances between the youngsters in our Army and the Italian gals, but we have it on good authority that the lads with hearts in America can't see 'em for dust. One last reassurance. Only officers can date Army or Navy Nurses, and for the most part there isn't much of this. As for the WACs, they have a strictly hands-off policy where someone else's man's concerned. After all, there's very little future in dating a gent who's already spoken for. Also, they're a pretty honorable gang of girls.

Never let him know that you doubt his fidelity or you'll send him straight to the arms of another babe. The wise thing is to allow each other a little rope, and then just trust to mutual loyalty to keep you both true.

NO MORE WEAK MOMENTS: There'll be times when you'll be tempted to let yourself be kissed. Maybe by a lad at the USO who smiles like your Joe or has a way of saying your name that's like his. Kissing him might be fun for a minute or two, but if you're serious about saving your love for Victory, you'll decide agin it. Your conscience will give you no peace at all, and you'll automatically begin to brood about Joe's being up to the same tricks. It's not worth it. If you find yourself liking some chap so much that every time you see him you're tempted more strongly, the obvious solution is to stop seeing him. You belong to someone else, remember. And don't begin worrying that you've fallen out of love with your own little man just because another one can get a rise out of you. Hundreds of men in the world might be very attractive to you, but there's just one for you to love, honor and cherish always. Don't let him down.

ARE YA A FOOL FOR JOOLS?

When we were a kid we used to love Christmas trees for their glitter. Now it's jewelry. We're pretty ecstatic over the idea of a MODERN SCREEN Pin. The design is heavenly and the feeling behind the thing . . . but it's all said, and said better, on page 76. Do see for yourself.

On the other hand, if in a moment of loneliness and confusion, you've let some boy make love to you, don't ruin your happiness chastising yourself for same. Confess it in a heart-to-heart letter, if your gent is the type who'd understand; if he's not, don't torture him with it. And next time, stay out of the moonlight.

NO MORE PICK-UPS: Let's face it, gals, there is something about a uniform. Just any old plain swain looks like a million in khaki or Navy blue or Marine green. It's a dangerous situation. Gosh, before, if a fellow was a wolf, it stuck out all over him. In his sharp suits and flashy ties. In the angle of his hat and the color of his socks. You couldn't miss him. Now the lambs and the wolves are as one, and a lot of girls can't seem to tell the difference. A lot of girls seem to think all service men are angels. This is known as uniformitis, and it's a bad thing.

Kids who wouldn't look crooked at a civilian they didn't know, think nothing of giving a totally strange soldier the old eye. The uniform puts it all on a different basis, think they. Well, nine times out of ten, the lad you lure into taking you to the movies or for a soda or a walk is

"I hate the day I married you!"

1. It was a horrible quarrel. I didn't believe I could ever say such things . . . we'd been so much in love, Fred and I. Then, these awful fights . . .

2. I couldn't do a thing right at work. One day, the personnel director called me. In a heart-to-heart talk I told her everything. Then she said: "My dear, there's one neglect most husbands can't forgive — carelessness about feminine hygiene."

3. She explained that many modern wives use Lysol disinfectant on their doctor's advice. "It cleanses thoroughly and deodorizes," she said. "And besides, it's so easy to use. Just follow the directions on the package—it won't harm sensitive vaginal tissues."

4. Since that day I've learned how right she was. I've found Lysol easy to use and inexpensive, too. But the big thing is this . . . the scenes in our home are all love scenes now!

The tenth in our series on THE FOODS OF OUR ALLIES

The Dominican Republic

Ambassadress of good will, Universal star Maria Montez, pictured here with the Dominican President's daughter, Flor Trujillo, is both decorative and "decorated," now that she can proudly wear two notable awards presented to her by her native land for "meritorious achievement."

Maria as she looks in "Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves."

We are both pleased and proud to be able to feature the Dominican Republic at this particular time. In fact, we consider it in the nature of a scoop! Because February is the very month when this progressive little "good neighbor" of ours is celebrating—with appropriate and extensive ceremonies—the 100th Anniversary of its Independence from European Domination!

We feel particularly privileged in having, as our guides and mentors on this culinary voyage to the Caribbean, the two most glamorous representatives in the United States of this particular country—both of whom are outstanding examples of emancipated Latin-American womanhood.

On the diplomatic side we present the First Secretary of the Dominican Embassy in Washington, Señorita Flor Trujillo, daughter of the Dominican President, His Excellency General Doctor Rafael Leonidas Trujillo. While from the cinema capital we bring you Señorita Trujillo's compatriot, childhood playmate and good friend, Maria Africa Gracia Vidal de Santo Silas—better known to us as Maria Montez, but who (just to make the record complete) is happiest when addressed as Mrs. Jean Pierre Aumont!

We interviewed both these Dominican beauties for our story. And we came away not only regretting, with Miss Montez, that we couldn't attend their Centennial Celebration this year, but also convinced that the history of the Dominican Republic contains more that is exciting and picturesque than could be found even in the highly exotic pictures in which Maria stars.

For this little nation of Spanish origin—which occupies the Eastern portion of the second largest island in the Antilles group—can claim the distinction of having been discovered by Christopher Columbus in 1492, during his first "voyage to the Indies." His admiration for this newfound land, with its rich soil, high mountains and beautiful vegetation was so great that eventually he settled there.

On this island—which Columbus named Hispaniola—was founded by the "Adelantado" (Governor) Bartolomé Colon, Columbus' brother, the oldest Christian city in the New World, Santo Domingo. (This name was recently changed to Ciudad Trujillo, in honor of the Dominican President who was so largely responsible for rebuilding it after the disastrous cyclone of 1930.) Here—in what was, for a long time, the center of Spain's Colonial operations—is to be found the first University in the Western Hemisphere. Here, also, is the oldest cathedral in America, built in 1512, where now repose the ashes of Christopher Columbus.

These were some of the points Señorita Trujillo thought we should know about the country we are featuring this month. But the things Maria Montez remembers most vividly about the land of her birth are its scenic beauties and the wonderful beaches protected by coral reefs. She told us that she often misses the romantic life of her home there, which she shared with five brothers and four sisters! And she became positively nostalgic when describing the native music and the Merengue—a Dominican dance that's a cross between a waltz and a rumba—which is something we certainly wanted to ask Maria to demonstrate!

By Marjorie Deen

But since our interests were, primarily, neither historical nor Terpsichorean, but out-and-out culinary, we finally concentrated on Dominican dishes. Fortunately we had the cooperation of both lovely ladies when it came to contributing directions for preparing these specialties. For we found Flor Trujillo happy to supplement Maria's memories of her favorite foods with practical recipes which anyone can follow.

Dominican cooking, we learned, is not highly spiced like Mexican cooking; in fact the results are rather bland. They cook with peanut oil and also use lard extensively—two ideas which should find favor with us in view of the lower point cost of these products. The regular menu, both for lunch and supper, consists of soup, a first course—like a soufflé or fish—then the main course. "And always a dessert!" added the attractive daughter of El Presidente.

Because the island enjoys a favorable climate—tropical in nature but mild and pleasant—there is an abundance of fresh vegetables and fruits and these are extensively featured in their meals. Here again, you see, we can "do as the Dominicans do" to our point profit. We can also add interest to our own meals by serving the "different" dishes so highly recommended by Maria Montez.

First we have Arroz con Pollo . . . or Rice with Chicken. This is a great favorite in practically all Spanish-speaking countries.

Next we have Habichuelas Rojas and Arroz Blanco . . . an economical combination of red kidney beans and rice—the former flavored to perfection and the latter cooked so that each grain stands out.

Now we come to Pastelitos—the finest way imaginable for serving a small amount of meat or poultry—tastefully encased in a "pocketbook" of special pastry.

Finally we have two desserts—which is quite to be expected with a country which ranks so high among the sugar-producing republics of Latin America. One recipe is for Quesillo de Pina, a rich pineapple custard. The second sweet is Flan de Leche Condensada. When you learn that it's a custard made with sweetened condensed milk, you'd probably be right in suspecting that this dish originated in our own country, to be subsequently adopted by Dominicans.

In point of fact, the Dominican Republic is so closely related geographically, culturally, commercially and by ties of spiritual affinity with the United States that we can think of no country in whose customs and foods we should be more greatly interested—especially now, when "The Land Columbus Loved Best" is in the news because of the anniversary that is being celebrated there, at this very time!

If you are interested in receiving directions for these Dominican dishes that are so "delightfully different" without being too hard to prepare, just fill out and mail this coupon. You'll love the leaflet's cover, with its attractive crest, and the recipes conveniently printed on filing cards.

We don't believe any sensible woman needs urging to be careful with soap. To buy just what she needs. To get full value from every ounce. To make every bar last as long as possible . . .

just a sweet, lonesome, GI joe with nothing on his mind but his overseas cap. But the tenth one—that's the boy you've gotta watch. Maybe he was the terror of Podunk, the guy who was washed out of high school for spiking the junior prom punch. A word of advice, then. Don't pick up anyone. Not the frozen-looking hitch-hiking private (if you're alone in the car). nor that baby-faced sailor in front of Liggett's. A D. S. C. to a Royal Crown bottle cap, he's okay. But why take a chance?

NO MORE CAT SESSIONS: The Friday Night Club all started out on a nice high plane. You knitted things for Them and maybe played a little bridge and then raided the ice-box. All perfectly lovely fun. But lately, you've skipped the knitting and gone in for plenty of good old juicy bizz-bazz. You've gotten so you can't wait for Friday so's you can spill all you know about Marie and Jack—which is plenty, all terrible. You can hardly sit through Helen's spiel about Martha Greer's father so that you can get in your guff about the gym teacher. Gosh, kids, that's awfully sixth grade.

We know some co-eds who snapped themselves out of gossiping binges this way. They farmed out work from the Red Cross; bandages, dressings, knitting, anything there was to be done. Some nights they wrote letters to all the boys in uniform they'd promised mail to, but just hadn't come through. Other times they went en masse to be blood donors. Best idea of all was a kitty into which each one put a dime every time she broke down and told All about somebody.

NO MORE WHITE LIES: Oh sure, it's easier to tell Dad you've finished your French when the kids come around begging you to go skating. It's easier to tell Bill you're crazy about him because he's going away and he's so mad for you. Easier to fib about so many little things. But listen, Butch, it's not smart. For one thing, every time you do, you're getting a wee bit more spineless. And those little white ones frequently boomerang and embarrass you out of your wits. And they can lead you into real deceit. Next time you're tempted think it over. And we hope you'll decide to go straight.

So much for your resolutions. Me, I've got one, too, and it's this. To answer personally every letter you girls write me, and I really do want you to write. Maybe you're having beau-trouble; maybe you're wondering why the lads leave you alone. Or how to find the right war job. Or routinize those deadly household chores so's there'll be a little time, at least, for lazing. If you're stuck with a dilemma, no matter what, I'm here to help, complete with shoulder to cry on and gobs of solutions. So c-mon. *Give. I SAW IT HAPPEN

I recently met Anna Lee in Iran with the Jack Benny USO troupe, heard her pull a couple of corkers like describing an Army Air Base as a bunch of airplanes surrounded by a crap game. Afterwards I handed her and Miss Shaw a five-rial note (Persian paper money) to autograph. Upon approaching Miss Lee to tell her about MODERN SCREEN's wanting short anecdotes, she said, "When you write them, make it clear that I am now an American citizen!" Also a honey!

TALL, DARK AND RUGGED

he wanted to bag himself a tender buck.

So he slung a bedroll and a 30-30 rifle behind his motorcycle seat and roared off for the woods. Disregarding such minor matters as no sleep and 6000-foot altitude, he lugged his rifle over mountains all day and roared back on the highways in time for the Monday morning take. Then he acted all day after that man-killing feat. He was tired that night, but Jimmy was happy. He had got his buck.

I'm not telling this on James Craig to prove what a rugged he-man he is, although with his six-foot-two inch, 190 pounds of muscle, you could say that, too, and not be far off the beam. The point is: When Jimmy Craig wants anything, he's the man to go after it—and get it—no matter what.

That's the main reason this tall, dark and determined Tennessean is in Hollywood today, heading the heap of new male stars and getting himself called a new Gable (which makes him sore), even though James Craig himself is no great actor and is the first Joe in the world to admit it. Actually, Jimmy does remind you of Gable a lot, whether he likes it or not.

He's got that same dark, rugged manliness of Clark's, plus the boyish good looks of Johnny Payne (since we're comparing people), but he's also got a lot of things that belong to nobody else but James Craig. For instance, a pair of brown eyes with a perpetually teasing twinkle in them, a big, restless body that moves around like it's always just busting for action, and a stubborn mouth that doesn't say "Maybe"—but yells "Yes!"

Even Jimmy admits he's a stubborn Dutchman at heart (his real name's James Henry Meador) mixed in with a bit of Unreconstructed Southern Rebel and tuned up with a touch of Texan cockiness and independence. The combination seems to be irresistible, because it has landed Jimmy Craig about everything he has bent a covetous eye on in life—from acting careers to cream separators and chicken wire!

Just the other day Farmer Jim, whose prime hobby since the war started has been making his San Fernando valley ranch produce groceries for Uncle Sam, found himself with three fresh Jersey cows on his hands and a flock of some 3000 obstreperous chickens with wandering ideas.

canny craig . . .

For the milk bonanza he needed a cream separator, which he didn't have, and for the poultry absenteeism he just had to have some old-fashioned chicken wire. But when Jimmy went around to hardware stores and such, they laughed merrily right in his anxious face. "Why," chuckled the bitter merchants, "the kind of chicken wire you want hasn't been seen since Pearl Harbor!" As for cream separators, they inquired nastily if Jimmy didn't also want a few dozen pairs of nylons, a set of prewar tires and a case of 20-year old Bourbon whisky. Spare cream separators on the Pacific Coast, it seemed, just ain't, what with the metal shortage and dairy expansion and all.

Well, that might have stopped anybody but Farmer Jim Craig. But his hard head told him there'd be an idle separator somewhere back on the Tennessee farms he knew. So he wrote personal pleas to a flock of volunteer farmers and sent off a bunch of want ads to all the hill-billy weekly papers. Pretty soon a separator was on the way out to the California ranch, and today it's clanking merrily away among all the Vitamins X, Y, Z and Q that Jim's bossies produce.

As for the chicken wire. Jimmy got that, too—just exactly how isn't too clear. Something about night commando operations and foraging on his motor-bike all over the California ranch country in the dark of the moon, I gathered. Anyway, the chickens are soundly wired today and patriotically laying away like little ladies, instead of gadding about the countryside. That was what Jim Craig wanted.

It's hard for even Fate to harness a determined fellow like Jimmy Craig, once he makes up his mind. There's no good reason at all why James Henry Meador should ever have turned into James Craig, movie star—except that the same J. H. Meador shrewdly sized up the fortune there was in being a Hollywood star, said "that's for me"—and made it for him —in a few not-so-easy lessons. After all, a Nashville boy who ironed the kinks out of his long legs breaking clods on his grandpappy's Tennessee farm, peddled papers after school, carpentered during vacations, footballed his way through a Texas college and started his business life in the roughhouse surroundings of an East Texas oil field hasn't exactly the perfect background for a Barrymore. There's no point here in detailing the life and times of James Craig, step by step—except to point out that Jimmy has been a hustler all his life—with a canny eye focused on getting what makes the world go 'round and taking no back talk from said world.

schemes—not dreams . . .

At Rice Institute, in Houston, Texas, for instance, where he landed for college, Jimmy faced the problem of earning his cakes and coffee while he helped himself to some education. He tried hashing and waiting tables for a while, but there seemed to be no percentage in that, and it took time away from his fullbacking for the 'Varsity. So he decided to use the old bean instead.

In no time flat, Rah-Rah Jim had a half dozen airtight promotion rackets worked up that kept his bank balance in shape. He sent college customers to a certain Houston tailor—and he got his suits free. He dished out cards for a certain restaurant—and he solved the problem of how to eat. Then Jimmy discovered that the biggest hotel in Houston, with featured big name bands, was losing money on Friday nights. He promoted a College Night deal, guaranteed to fill the place with college kids at a reduced rate—and he did. The rate was $1.10—and Jimmy got the dime. There were plenty of dimes. He used to drag in $80 a week!

A promoter like that had no trouble landing a job when college days were over. Jimmy Meador sat very pretty in Texas with a General Motors job about the time he got the Hollywood idea. He padded his income and let off steam at the same time banging himself around the pro football circuits. He had a nice apartment in Houston, a lot of friends, dough in his pocket and a new car every year. But he still wasn't satisfied or independent enough, so he began to figure how he could get in business for himself. With typical Jimmy Craig shrewdness he reasoned thus:

A business for yourself takes capital. That he knew. Also that things he knew about—the oil business, the motor business —took big capital—such as he would never, never collect, inherit or luck on to. But there was one business in the U.S.A. that you could make a killing in which took no capital at all—acting for the movies. Yep—just like that James Craig decided that was the ticket. Nobody but a confident bloke like Jim could ever have approached acting with such a deliberate cold cash attitude and stood a chance of success. But Jimmy has never been afraid of anything in his life, and certainly Hollywood wasn't big enough to scare him. He drove right out (from Deep in the Heart of) on his next vacation.

What happened then has been told a time or two, so I'll tuck it up briefly by saying that Jimmy Craig went right to the target like a 30-30 bullet. He knew Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer was the biggest studio in Hollywood, so that's where he went—and he got in, too. Oliver Hinsdale, the dramatic coach there, gave him some good advice. He told Jimmy he could make the team only if he'd go get himself some polish and experience as an actor. He suggested going back home, hiring a voice coach and working in amateur theaters a while. That made good sense to Craig. He drove right back to Houston. He kept his job, but he gave up the apartment and the car and his fun at night with the gang and the gals. Instead he took lessons and did everything they'd let him do around the local little theater league. Then a year later he showed up in Hollywood and got his movie job. It wasn't at M-G-M, but at Paramount where Oliver Hinsdale had gone, and being a tall guy with a cowboy look and a natural knack with horses, they broke him in as a Western horse-opera hero.

James Craig might still be hi-hoing and twirling six guns on the screen for a living if he didn't have higher ideals—because one look at Jim, and you can see he's a perfect rugged rider type. He found the only way you could shake a pair of chaparajos in Hollywood was to get out and start fresh. So he went to Broadway, promoted himself a stage job with Guthrie McClintic, Katharine Cornell's husband, and got himself some real dramatic polish in a couple of Broadway plays. He did all this deliberately—just as he came back to Hollywood deliberately when he figured he was smooth enough. And to show you how Jimmy Craig figures things—not long after he hit Hollywood again, he had a chance to clean up with a fat Western contract.

It meant money in his jeans—and at that time he could use it—but he said "No!" Instead, he jumped at a chance to play in "Kitty Foyle" when Sam Wood gave him a break. Not many people know that Jimmy's salary for that job—the one that made him—was exactly $75 a week! For that matter, Jimmy played later in his biggest starring role to date, "All That Money Can Buy," for only $175. But he had his eye on what both those pictures would pay off with in bigger contracts. And so today he's right where he decided

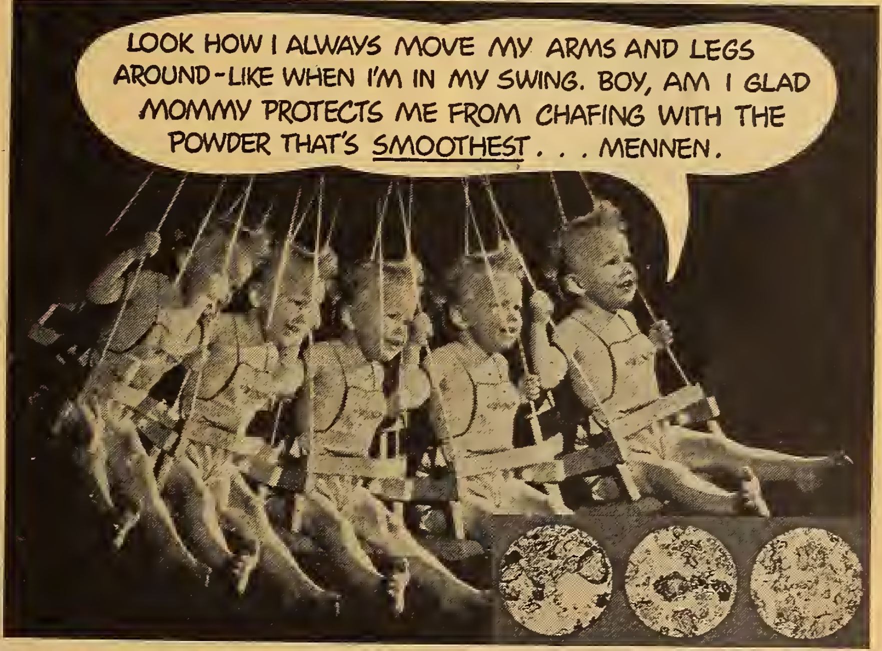
IF I COULD LIVE IN AN ELECTRIC LIGHT BULB, I MIGHT BE SAFE FROM GERMS THAT CAUSE SKIN RASHES: BUT I CAN'T, SO MOMMY PROTECTS ME WITH BABY POWDER THAT'S ANTISEPTIC . . . MENNEN.

Germs often cause common baby skin troubles such as prickly heat, diaper rash. To protect baby, best powder is Mennen. More antiseptic! Round photos above prove it. Centers of plates contain 3 leading baby powders. In gray areas, germs thrive; but in dark band around Mennen powder (far right), germ growth has been prevented!



LOOK HOW I ALWAYS MOVE MY ARMS AND LEGS AROUND-LIKE WHEN I'M IN MY SWING. BOY, AM I GLAD MOMMY PROTECTS ME FROM CHAFING WITH THE POWDER THAT'S SMOOTHEST . . . MENNEN.

Which baby powder is smoothest is proved by round photos above; they show 3 leading baby powders seen thru microscope. Mennen (far right) is smoother, finer in texture. That's due to special "hammerizing" process which makes Mennen Baby Powder the best protection against chafing. Delicate new scent keeps baby lovelier.

to be when he first came out—at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer—Hollywood's top league. Smart? Well, all I can say is that Jimmy Craig actually planned it that way. That's the kind of guy he is.

no art, no nothing . . .

But if he's primarily a business man rather than a dream artist—that's no sign James Craig doesn't take acting seriously. He does—only he doesn't art around about it. He considers it a job to do, and when he was a kid on his Grandpa's farm, the old man used to tell him: "Son—whatever you figure on doin'—do it good! Whether you're choppin' corn or buildin' a house or courtin' a gal—do a good job—then you'll feel right with yourself!" That's the way Jimmy feels about his acting. That's why of all the pictures he's made, he likes "The Human Comedy" best. Because he knew he did the best he could in that, and he thinks the picture was worth it. He's got a funny feeling that it helped a lot of people see things straight in these war-muddled times. And I think he's right.

Even when his picture jobs aren't exactly to his taste, Jimmy gives them all he has. Jimmy has had some doubts about playing a Caliph of Bagdad in "Kismet." He feels a little silly running around with a turban on, phony jewels, sequins (an M-G-M wisecracker told him, "You look just like Susan Peters in an Adrian hat!"), but while he gripes around the lot like a G.I. on KP, he hasn't missed a minute doing his stuff. In fact, one morning he arrived looking a little peaked, but not saying anything and went into the scene. It was one where he lifted Joy Page up on a high wall, and nobody noticed that when he did it, he almost fainted with pain. Because a bull on his farm had slammed into him the day before and broken four ribs. And anything more painful than four freshly busted ribs when you have to heave-ho is hard to imagine.

But then if he's anything, James Craig is all man. That's why he lives the life he does without any Hollywood frills or phony trimmings. That's why he sticks to the ranch every spare minute away from the camera. Jim got his ranch, by the way, because again he just had to have something—namely a horse.

He was over on location near Taos, New Mexico, a few years back making "Valley of the Sun," when the local caballeros lined up a free-for-all horse race to climax the fiesta. Indians, Mexicans and rancheros lined up a motley bunch of cayuses to dash across the dusty desert. and right in the middle was a spotted horse that grabbed Jim's eye and held it.

the cart before the horse . . .

Being a Tennessee-Texan, Jimmy knows "hosses" from head to hooves, and the way this particular pony pranced and reared he knew he had real blood in him. The funny part was that a little girl about 12 years old was sitting his saddle, and Jim rushed up to the owner before the race got going and begged to ride the horse himself. He was afraid the girl would get herself killed in all that mob of wild horses, and maybe the horse would, too. Already he had the idea. He wanted to own that spotted horse. Before the race even started, he had the deal on the fire too. And sure enough, with the frail little girl who stuck to the saddle all right, Jim's spotted prize bounded out like a jackrabbit and won like a champion. Only after he found himself with a horse on his hands did Jimmy Craig realize that he had no place to keep it! So when he came back to Hollywood he practically had to go into hock for a ranch.

It has really been the greatest invest-

Craig's ranch has kept him thoroughly happy though a movie star. He doesn't go much for movie social life—he can't stand the "gossip," and anyway all his best friends, as he says, are gas station attendants. Night clubs and cafés are okay with him for a gay evening out. But he's too Scotch to enjoy them when they put the bite on him. A while back some old friends from Texas came out to Hollywood, and Jimmy got dolled up and took them to the current Hollywood showcase. The drinks were bad, the waiters snooty, and after a couple of tired sandwiches or something equally nourishing, Jim drew the check. It was $88! He realized he was stuck and paid off, but he punched himself in the jaw the minute he got outside for being a sucker. He thought of what all that dough could have done on the ranch.

Because that's where he's sinking his money—right in the ground. He makes enough of it these days, too. And after the War Bond allotment is taken out, Jimmy's dollars and his spare time go into improving the place. When he took it over, there wasn't much besides a California ranch house and a few rickety sheds. The barn had burned down, and about the only livestock around there were some rabbits and field mice.

Since then Jim has built all new buildings himself with the help of a carpenter. "Punch," his horse, and Punch's mate, "Judy," have a swell stable and so do the cows, dogs, chickens and other farm life that crow, cackle and moo around the place. When the war broke, Jim ditched his golf clubs, greased up his guns and fishing tackle and put them away. He put all his energies, thoughts and money, too, in the ranch, adding thousands of chickens. All in all, he figures he's sunk around $18,000 in it, and every spare minute of his time away from a busy picture schedule. Sometimes he wonders if it's worth it when the pip or something cleans out his chickens, or when a night's midwifing with a cow doesn't work out right. But at those times Jimmy Craig, who loves animals and crops and everything about a farm, charges it all off to entertainment and exercise.

His big body keeps in shape hustling around his farm chores. He's never had any trouble with extra pounds or any kind of regimented body care—which is rare when a big fellow who's been an athlete starts to get his age, around 31. And it keeps him feeling like a million dollars, because there's nothing at all the matter with Jimmy Craig's health except a few busted bones here and there and some joints that still feel the effects of his football days. He doesn't baby himself either—eats everything in the world with emphasis on Southern cooking. smokes pipes one after the other and cigarettes when he's nervous.

Maybe because he's always feeling fit as a fiddle, Jim Craig owns a disposition like a lamb, despite the fact that he's built like Jack Dempsey and has some Cherokee Indian blood in him, too, to make him ornery. Like all big guys, he's a particular sucker for kids, and all the time he was making "Lost Angel" with Margaret O'Brien, he spent his extra studio time with that cute little miss, playing games with her on the set and teasing her—because if there's one weakness Jim has, it's stirring up a little fun with everyone he meets.

"sughah" and spice . . .

In "Lost Angel," Jimmy and Margaret play a sort of sentimental man and kiddie love affair in a very pretty little story, and they kept it up on the set between scenes. Every morning Jimmy bowed when she arrived and said, "How's my some of that Tennessee mushmouth that even diction coaches haven't been able to iron out—they had lunch together every day, and he was always bringing her intriguing presents from the ranch, like baby ducks and chickens. So it got to a very serious stage. And Margaret very boldly stated one day right to Jim's face, "When I grow up I'm going to marry you!" But little Maggie also liked Van Johnson, and Jim started kidding her.

"Van Johnson" he stated wisely, "has false hair!"

Maggie was shocked. "He has not!"

"Yes he has," stated Jim soberly. "I saw him putting his wig on in the dressing room."

Margaret was loyal. "Just the same I'm going to get his autograph in my book," she said, "and he hasn't false hair, either!"

"Now listen," said Jimmy, "if you're going to be my girl, you can't go around getting other men's autographs. At least, if you do, you've got to get it on the very last page of the book. I'm jealous!"

Next day Margaret showed up with her book and brazenly spread it open before Jim's eyes. She had Van's autograph all right. It was right on the front page. Jimmy Craig grinned and applauded the kid's spunk. That's the stuff he admires above everything. And that's why he treats his own boy, James, Jr., rough and ready. Jimmy wants the Bub, as he calls his son, to grow up to be a real man.

When he tumbles off ranch ponies, Jimmy puts him right back on, just like his own Grandpa used to do on the Tennessee farm when he was a moppet. And already Jimmy has taught the Bub to put up a scrap, although Jimmy the Second was only four this last December. For a while Jimmy was worried because the Bub was turning out to be good-looking, almost too good-looking. One night recently he came home to find that Junior had tumbled off the porch on his face and blacked his eyes and puffed up his nose. His mother was worried and upset. Jimmy promptly made her mad to boot when he smiled broadly and said, "He looks a lot better this way!"

Of course, the process of toughening up his son sometimes backfires on Father Craig. Like the other day when Junior would have no truck with his milk, and Jimmy tried to be a stern papa about it. "Drink your milk!" he ordered.

"No!" said Bub.

"Drink it!"

"No! No milk now! I don't want it."

"All right, if you drink it, you can go out to the ranch and ride."

Bub gave him a low look with plenty of steam on it. "I'll bust your ribs!" he growled.

Since the bull butting had revealed a weakness in his Dad's chest armor, the Bub though that threat might turn the trick. However, Jimmy doesn't think he's in any danger of getting manhandled by his son quite yet. Because when he was playing with the Bub later on, letting the kid hit him here and there, and wailing like he was badly hurt, he overplayed the part a little, and when Bub's tiny fist socked him in the stomach, he fell off the chair in a mock knockout and rolled on the wall like he'd kissed the canvas and was hearing the birdies sing. When the Bub saw the devastating results of his haymaker, and his pappy stretched out, he set up a dismal wail and ran to his Mother. "Daddy's dead," he wailed. "I just killed him." What pleased Jimmy after he broke up the gag was that his son was at least sorry enough to cry after he'd bowled over his poor old dad.

Matter of fact, the Bub is pretty proud of his old man, even at his tender age. He calls all movies "pich," but whenever he refers to them as "the big pich"—that means his pop is in them. Bub calls Jimmy's studio "M-D-M."

But you can see that with the Spartan ideas James Craig has about the raising of sons and heirs, his wife has plenty to put up with around the house. She doesn't seem to mind. In fact, there aren't many couples around Hollywood who get along as smoothly as Jimmy Craig and his wife, Mary. She was Mary Ray, from Washington, D. C., when Jimmy first met her, and she was in Hollywood with movie ambitions. In fact, they met over at the David Selznick lot. Mary was one of the Southern belles at Tara in "Gone with the Wind," and Jimmy, who at that time was briefly under contract to Selznick (as he has been under contract to almost every studio in Hollywood at some time), was spending his time making tests with all the ambitious Scarlett O'Haras and Melanies in Hollywood: Paulette Goddard, Frances Dee, Olivia de Havilland, Dorothy Jordan, Vivian Leigh and all the rest of them.

cupid on a broomstick . . .

At that time Jimmy Craig had little to vouch for his future except his own supreme confidence, but just the same Mary Ray married him one Hallowe'en night—of all times—and from then on, wisely enough, she tossed her own screen ambitions out the window. Maybe that's why they've remained so happy. One career in the family.

Mary is a slim, pretty, auburn-haired girl who could land herself a job in a studio any day in the week just on her good looks. But she prefers to supervise the care and feeding of Jimmy Craig and the Bub as a career. It's a toss-up with Mary just which is the biggest problem at times—such as when Jimmy tangled with Homer.

Homer is this young bull who handed Jimmy the one-two and cracked his ribs. Jimmy acquired Homer along with his milk cows from Director Clarence Brown, when he was making "The Human Comedy." At first he was a bull-ette or whatever you call a young bull, and among Jimmy's recreational delights was wrestling him around the barnyard. That was okay until Homer started getting big enough to toss his weight around. And one morning when Jimmy was trying a half-Nelson on his horns, his hat slipped, he loosed his grip on Homer to jam it back on his head, and Homer let him have it. Things like that make Mary heave hopeless sighs. But ordinarily she doesn't have too many worries about her husband. He's a pretty decent husband around the house. In fact, in some ways, Jimmy is downright helpful.

He can fix anything that needs fixing, a handy man supreme, whether it's an egg-beater or a tractor. He can even cook, having "bached" around a good many years before he got married and camp-cooked on a thousand or so fishing and hunting trips. His specialties are pancakes, fried chicken and spaghetti—not exactly a health diet, but good when you're hungry. Jimmy's neat and clean—even fussy about his personal habits—and he's been trained to hang his barnyard dungarees out on the back porch. He goes to bed early, gets up feeling fine, likes books and records and generally qualifies as a homebody. The only vice that's been discovered in his private life is a weakness for poker parties with the boys, but being a wise wife, Mary doesn't mind this—especially since the game is usually penny-ante, and most of the time the poker club is smoking up somebody else's house.

no banking on banks . . .

The Craigs don't live all the time at the ranch. Jim's brother lives there and runs it because since James Craig began clicking he's been busier than a bird dog, and with the gasoline drouth there had to be a haven nearer the studio. So the Craigs rent a house in Beverly Hills, but that is just a halfway stop to the ranch. Jimmy will never sink any of his hard-earned money into a city house. "When you step out on a sidewalk, where can you go?" is the way he looks at it. His ambition is to buy himself a real ranch with thousands of acres some of these days over in Arizona or New Mexico near good fishing and hunting, and his idea of Heaven, he swears, would be to step out on the front porch and see "a herd of white-faced cattle as far as I can look."

A dream like that come true would take a sockfull, of course, but James H. Meador always was thrifty. He dresses like Mr. Joe Average, with a leaning toward tweedy stuff, but he seldom wears these clothes out because half the time he's in boots, jeans and a checked shirt or zipped up in a leather jacket on his motorbike. He hasn't a speck of personal jewelry except a chronometer wrist watch that will do about everything except cook and a heavy silver identification chain. The only sartorial weakness Jim confesses to is bright red ties.

He drives a soft top convertible car that you'd never look at twice and the motorbike, which started as a gas-saving measure but has grown to a hobby with Jimmy so that he's expert enough now to make those cross-country hunting dashes we told you about. Jimmy bought the machine second hand from Ray Milland, and a Beverly Hills traffic cop taught him how to make it do tricks. He's been particularly interested in getting really good on it, too, because he thinks the proficiency might come in handy in the Army one of these days when they call him up.

Jimmy Craig was 3-A until the father draft came along, but he's 1-A now, so he has a hunch he'll be trading in his air raid warden's helmet for the real McCoy one of these days, which is fine with Jim. Typically Craig and figuring out his shots, Jimmy has been taking celestial navigation in his off-hours ever since he was classified 1-A. He'd like to be already at something useful when he gets into G.I. rags.

the man behind the moustache . . .

About the only extravagance or indulgence or whatever you'd call it that James Craig will miss in the Army is his barber. There's just one thing a capable cuss like himself hates to do—that's shave. When he doesn't have to, he'll let his black beard sprout like devil grass, but when he makes pictures, which is almost always of late, he depends on Milo at M-G-M to keep his face smooth. Milo is used to almost anything in the male movie whisker line, but lately he just missed a nervous breakdown over Jim Craig's moustache.

Jimmy always wears one, if possible, in a movie—it's almost his screen trademark by now, and in "Lost Angel" and "The Heavenly Body" he wore it straight as usual. Then came along "Kismet," and as the caliph he had to grow one of those droopy Oriental muzzies. That was okay—only in the middle of "Kismet," which has been dragging on for months, Jimmy had to chase back and do retakes and added scenes on both "Lost Angel" and "The Heavenly Body." Every day, it seemed to Milo, Jimmy Craig was rushing in saying, "Change the moustache!" Either he wanted it straight or headed down in a droop. Pretty soon the thing looked like nothing human—half curved and half straight and nicked here and there by Milo's baffled razor as he inquired, "What the heck is it today—up or down?" Finally after patching Jimmy's lip up with phony fuzz and painting on false droops and what have you, the only thing to do was to shave it off and grow a whole new one over a week-end. That's really not such a feat for James Craig, either. He can sprout a lovely trained lip lure in a week at the outside. He can handle some other strictly he-man assignments, too, can Jimmy Craig, such as fighting, although he never picked a fight in his life, and like most big bruisers, is peaceable by nature. When he was a kid only 15, he stood 5 ft. 11 and weighed 160, but even in those days he never went on the warpath unprovoked.

SURPRISE ON PAGE 76

We're very proud of page 76. It's the first step toward a very ambitious idea and, we think, a heck of a sweet one. It involves you and us and one of the divinest pieces of costume jewelry free, or practically free. That's all we're saying. You can either guess the rest or turn to page 76.

"I was always afraid I'd hurt somebody," remembers Jimmy. "I always figured, too, that if I hit somebody and he didn't fall, I'd better run!" But they usually fell when James hit them.

He always noticed, even in those days, that it was the cocky little fisty kids who were always picking fights, as if they had to show the world they were hard cookies. Kids who could grow up and become Hitlers or act like sneak-punch Japs. As a boy, Jimmy never had much trouble with them when the chips were down, and he figures he can handle this end of the Big Scrap now if he has to and still get back to Hollywood after V-Day and start making pictures again.

He'd like that very much because by then the Bub will be big enough to help him herd around those "white faced cattle" and tote a 30-30 along on the deer hunts over in the desert mountains somewhere. You see, Jimmy Craig never lets up on that dream ranch of his for a minute.

And remember—what Jimmy Craig really sets his heart on he gets. Dollars to doughnuts you'll find him there one of these days. Just wait and see.

"STANDING ROOM ONLY"

(STORY)

"Do you know what that means?"

"I'm fired?"

"I can't fire you," said the foreman softly; then he roared: "But the general manager can. Go on up to his office."

"Thank you," said Miss Rogers.

Miss Rogers laid down her tools neatly, and whistling a gay little tune a trifle off pitch, she walked toward the row of offices that lay at one end of the factory floor. At the door marked Lee Stevens. Gen. Man., she turned in and, with a happy flip of her heels, pushed the door open.

Miss Rogers, Jean informally, had been trying for some two months to wangle some way of meeting the General Manager. She found him, to be entirely candid, a much more intriguing spectacle than the rows of Dopey Donkeys. Rightfully. Lee Stevens was the kind of man women would whistle at if women whistled at men; tall, but not too huge, the kind of shoulders that somehow reminded you of football weather, blue eyes, and there was something about his nose and the set of his mouth. . . . Masculine, that was the word. In a nice way, though; the kind of way you could fall in love with.

sexretary . . .

There was only one trouble with Lee Stevens. He was engaged to Alice Todd. And Alice, along with the fact that she had major league equipment in her own right, was the daughter of T. J. Todd. She was, so to speak, his prize tantalizing toy. That made her tough competition.

Jean realized how tough when she saw Alice come sweeping into the office and disappear into T. J.'s private sanctum. Through the door she could hear Alice's voice, distinct as a whip lash.

"I tell you, Dad," she was saying, "I won't have Lee taking that secretary of his to Washington. She's much too, much too . . . She's a *sex*retary, that's what she is!"

"But Alice, after all, he must have a secretary. You know Washington, and if we expect to land that ordnance contract for conversion—"

"He can take a different secretary. Get him another one!"

"All right, dear," T. J. said meekly. "All right, dear."

Alice exited. Five minutes later Lee Stevens entered. Ten minutes later Lee Stevens exited. He found Jean Rogers sitting demurely in front of his office. He frowned.

"Yes?" he said. "Did you want to see me?"

"I'm the new secretary," Jean Rogers said.

"Oh?" Lee Stevens said. "Well, at least that's off my mind. Fool idea of T. J.'s. We're leaving for Washington. On the six forty. Can you be ready?"

"Yes, sir," said Jean Rogers. "I'll be ready."

There is an unverified rumor that an escaped sardine took one look at Washington, shrugged and climbed back into the can. Lee Stevens, as he pushed through the crowded lobby of the hotel, was inclined to believe the rumor. He made the clerk's desk, asked for the key to his room and received a blank stare in return. Lee patiently explained that he had made reservations, that his secretary had gone on ahead to claim the room while he attended to business, that he was tired now, that he wanted the key to his room—

"The reservation was cancelled, sir," the clerk said, with a note of finality.

"Cancelled?"

"Oh, yes," said a voice.

Lee Stevens swung around; Jean Rogers smiled pleasantly at him.

"I cancelled it," she said. "You should have seen the rooms they gave us. Little holes. They weren't even fit for gophers. I told the clerk what he could do with those rooms—"

"Yes, ma'am," the clerk said. "I rented them to a convention."

"Where do we have rooms then?" Lee said quietly.

"Oh, we'll find something," Jean said airily. "After all this isn't the only hotel in Washington."

"You mean," Lee said tensely, "that you don't have any rooms anywhere else?"

"Don't worry," Jean said. "I'm your secretary. Let me worry about the details."

That night they slept on the lee side of a statue of a Civil War general. It rained. The general, being a military man and made of stone, didn't mind. Lee Stevens caught a cold.

"Well," he said hoarsely the next morning, "that's one detail you attended to."

"I'm sorry, Mr. Stevens," Jean said. "I'm sure I'll find a room today."

"I wish I were sure."

"Don't you worry one bit about it."

"It seems to me," Lee Stevens said, "that I've heard that line before. Do you use it on all the men you work for?"

"You'll see," Jean said.

"That's one thing I'm sure of," Lee said. "I'll see. I'll probably see our old friend the General again tonight. You don't think he'll be angry if I stay over again? Or did he invite us for the duration?"

"You have an appointment," Jean said briskly, "at ten this morning with Mr. Ritchie of the O. P. D."

"We have an appointment," Lee said.

"Me—and my cold germs."

washington merry-go-round . . .

Lee Stevens came back to the statue some seven hours later. It was getting on toward dusk. Lee had laryngitis. He had a cold in the head, in the chest, in the throat, in the nose and in such assorted bones as he could still feel. He glared at Jean.

Jean said brightly: "Did you see Mr. Ritchie?"

"I did not," Lee said. "There were only three hundred and forty-seven people ahead of me. Did you get a place?"

"Well," Jean said.

"Did you?" Lee roared.

Jean nodded. "I think you'll like it . . . I hope."

As a matter of fact, Lee liked it very much. The house was grand, spacious, pleasant. It looked about as much like a tourist home as the Taj Mahal looks like a shack. The Cromwells, the owners, seemed to be pleasant enough people. Lee relaxed on the big double bed in their little suite of rooms. There was a small room off the bedroom with a sofa. They could make that up into a bed for Jean.

"Wonderful," Lee said through his stuffed nose. "I take it back, all the harsh things I ever said about you, Miss Rogers."

A buzzer shrilled imperially.

"As a matter of fact, Miss Rogers, you are undoubtedly the most resourceful secretary in America today. I didn't think anyone would ever find a room in Washington these days."

"Mr. Stevens," Jean said.

The buzzer began again.

Lee said: "What were you saying?"

"I was saying that it really is very hard to find anything at all in Washington. There must be a hundred people applying for every empty space—"

"But you did it," Lee said smiling. "Remind me to give you a raise when we get back."

"I think you ought to know—" Jean began again.

The buzzer became a single, harsh, penetrating sound.

"What the devil is that?" Lee said. "That sound."

"It's a buzzer," Jean said.

"What do they need a buzzer in the room for?" Lee said.

"I suppose they ring it," Jean said slowly, "when they want the butler."

"The butler," Lee said, "well, let him answer it."

"That's what I was going to tell you," Jean said. "You're the butler."

For a full minute Lee Stevens didn't say anything; then slowly he rose from the bed, holding his aching head. He stood over Jean Rogers like a menacing Buddha, and then he slowly said: "Just what are you trying to say?"

"Well, you see," Jean said hurriedly. "I looked all over town, and there wasn't a single room to be had. And I knew we just had to have a room. There you were with that miserable cold and everything. Then I saw the ad."

"What ad?"

"The ad for a butler and cook. And they said they had a lovely room for the couple applying, good hours, decent wages, plenty of time off—and this room. We just had to have a room, so—"

"So," Lee Stevens said slowly, "so you took the job."

"Yes," Jean said. "I'm the cook and—"

"And I'm the butler," Lee said.

The buzzer blared harshly.

Lee Stevens stared at it for a moment. Then, still slowly he crawled back into bed, pulled the covers up to his chin, placed a pillow over his head.

"That's it," said Jean. "You just get yourself a good night's rest. Don't worry about a thing. I'll attend to all the details."

"Go away," Lee said from under the pillow. "Go away!"

But Washington being what Washington is, Lee thought better of it in the morning. At least they had a roof over their heads. And, after all, even butlers were entitled to days off. He promptly asked Mr. Cromwell for the day and hustled off to waylay Ritchie of the O. P. D. He returned with a good deal of the hustle worn off him. He found Jean in the kitchen, busily puttering with pots, pans and assorted dishes.

ain't frisking friskies . . .

"Washington," he groaned.

"Didn't you see Mr. Ritchie today?" Jean said.

"Not one hair of his balding head," Lee said. "But I saw something worse. Farenhall's in town."

"Farenhall?"

"Of Farenhall's Friskies. Our competitor. He probably smelled something in the wind and is down here, too. Probably trying for the same contract we are. It's his hide or mine. We've got to see Ritchie first."

"You will," Jean said. "Now just stop worrying about it and get dressed."

"Dressed?" Lee said.

"In the butler uniform. The Cromwells are having a party tonight. You'll have to serve, of course."

Lee closed his eyes for a moment as if in great pain. When he opened them, they had a dazed, resigned look. "All right," he said. "But first I want you to take a letter. You're still my secretary. To T. J. Todd—"

"Mr. Stevens—"

"Dear Todd: Am here in Washington and am sorry to report—"

"I'm sorry, Mr. Stevens," Jean said. "But I can't take shorthand."

Lee swung around sharply. "What are you talking about?"

So she told him. Of the Dopey Donkeys. Of overhearing about his need for a new secretary. She hoped he didn't mind. She was really trying. She could do almost everything . . . but she couldn't take shorthand.

"Why did you do it?" Lee groaned. "Why in the world did you do it?"

She gave him a long searching look: "Well—"

For a moment he didn't understand; and then suddenly he did. It was very quiet in the kitchen. Lee Stevens was aware, very sharply, that he was standing very close to Jean, that she was leaning forward a bit, and that she was (odd! that he had never realized it before) very beautiful. He kissed her.

She said a little unsteadily: "We better start serving, don't you think? . . ."

dinner for 10 please, james . . .

Just as unsteadily, he said: “Where's my monkey suit . . .”

The butler's uniform was a little tight in spots, and it creaked ominously at the seams every time Lee raised an arm. But he managed. Carrying the tray of hors d'oeuvres, he grinned at Jean just before he went through the swinging door and into the main dining room. Five minutes later he was back, white and shaken. He leaned against the wall.

“He's out there,” Lee said tensely. “Ritchie's out there.”

“Why, that's wonderful,” Jean said. “You couldn't get to see him in his office, and here he is all wrapped up and waiting right here.”

“Wonderful,” Lee groaned. “He'll certainly be impressed, won't he? A butler trying to sell him on an ordnance contract.”

“I think he'll admire your initiative,” Jean said.

“Hmm,” Lee said. “Maybe he will, at that. He's supposed to be a shirt-sleeve democrat. Bring on the next course!”

Jean opened the stove.

“Mr. Stevens,” she said. “I have something to tell you.”

“What's wrong now?”

“I put the turkey in all right,” she said. “But I forgot to turn on the gas. It's still raw.”

“Well, cook it or something. They're waiting out there.”

“You can't cook a turkey in five minutes,” Jean said, moaning. “I've ruined everything.”

Lee said grimly: “I'll get to Ritchie if it's the last thing I do. What have you got in the kitchen?” He rummaged through the closets. “Ah, flour, buckwheat. Get out the griddle, Jean. The Cromwells and the Ritchies are going to have buckwheat cakes. North Woods style. . . .”

“At a formal dinner?” Jean said. “You can't.”

“Got any other ideas?”

“Well—”

“Buckwheat cakes it is, then,” Lee said.

So it was buckwheat cakes, and after he served them, Lee came back hurriedly into the kitchen. Jean was waiting for him tensely.

“How did it go?” she said.

“I didn't stop to watch,” Lee said. “I just served them and ran. We'll find out soon enough. . . .”

The swinging door to the kitchen began to edge cautiously inward. A head popped around and peered into the kitchen. Mr. Ritchie advanced with his finger perched warningly over his lips.

“Mr. Ritchie,” Jean said. “What—”

“Shh,” he whispered. “I don't like to do this. But those buckwheat cakes. Best I ever ate.”

“Thank you,” said Jean.

“Matter of fact, I wonder,” Mr. Ritchie whispered urgently, “I wonder if you two would be interested in coming to my house. . . .”

Lee cleared his throat: “Mr. Ritchie—” he said.

Ritchie said: “Don't worry about pay. I'll meet the price.”

“The pay isn't important,” Lee said. “What I do want to talk to you about is—”

“Then it's settled,” Mr. Ritchie said. “We're having a little party over at my house tomorrow. You'll be there?”

stevens stymied . . .

“Yes, yes,” Lee said. “I've been trying—”

“Fine,” Ritchie said. “I've got to get back now.”

He was out of the swinging door before Lee could say another word.

“Well, he liked the buckwheat cakes,” Jean said.

“The buckwheat cakes!” Lee said explosively. "I want a contract. That's what I want!"

"It certainly ought to be easier to talk to him in his own house," Jean said. "Just stop worrying about it."

Lee looked at her glumly: "Stop using that phrase," he said. "Just stop using it. . . ."

It was unfortunate that the Todds, T. J. and Alice, chose to come to Washington early the next day. They peered up at the Cromwell mansion a little dubiously. T. J. checked the address with a letter in his hand, then shrugged and rang the bell. The butler answered it.

T. J. looked at Lee Stevens; Lee Stevens stared back.

"What goes on here?" T. J. roared.

"I can explain everything," Lee said.

In the kitchen the Todds listened doubtfully while Lee began telling his story. Jean came in. Alice Todd took one look at Jean, and an ugly glint came into her eye.

"So that's how it stands, T. J.", Lee said. "You understand."

"I do not," T. J. said. "This town is mad."

Alice said frigidly: "And who is the girl, Lee?"

"My secretary," Lee said.

"You don't say?" Alice said.

"He does say," Jean said. "And what do you have to say?"

"A few things," Alice Todd said. "I want you to get rid of her, Lee. Fire her."

"Wait a minute—" Lee said.

"Why she's nothing but a cheap—"

"Listen, you parasite—" Jean began heatedly.

"Girls, girls!" T. J. said.

Alice turned to Lee: "I'm waiting, Lee. Does this—this female—mean anything to you?"

For a moment there was a dead silence in the kitchen. Then Lee Stevens spoke slowly.

"Yes," he said. "Yes, I think she does."

"Then we're finished," Alice said frigidly.

"I guess we are," Lee said.

Alice turned tensely to her father: "Aren't you going to do anything about it? Fire him!"

"If my job depends on that," Lee shouted, "I quit!" He stalked out of the room, and T. J., after a quick glance at his daughter, followed him hurriedly.

"We're alone now Miss Whatever-your-name-is. . . ."

"Rogers," Jean said.

"Do you know what you've just done?"

"I got a man," Jean said brightly. "What have you got?"

Alice said: "So you have a man. A man who's just thrown his future away. Did you know he was going to get a half interest in the plant when this contract went through? And you think you're worth that? You must certainly love him a great deal to make him give up his whole future. . . ."

Jean said slowly: "I didn't know that."

"You know now."

"Yes," Jean said. "I know now. Thanks for telling me. No, I couldn't ask him to give up all that. You'll tell him something, won't you? I don't think I could manage it . . . if I had to see him again . . ."

Alice Todd watched Jean walk slowly out of the kitchen: "I'll tell him," she said. "Don't worry about it."

So when Lee Stevens returned to the butler's room in the Cromwell house, he found that Jean was gone. Disappeared. T. J. followed him in talking volubly: T. J., it turned out, didn't want to fire him at all; what's more he was pleased that Lee had given Alice her lumps, she was a spoiled brat. All T. J. was interested in was the

"She's gone!" Lee said breathlessly.

"You can always get a new secretary," T. J. said impatiently. "Let's get after Ritchie."

But at the offices of the O. P. D. they found the waiting room glutted as usual.

"I've got an idea," Lee said.

"Shoot," T. J. said.

"Remember I told you that Ritchie offered Jean and me a job at his house? Well, we're going to take it. We may not be able to get in to see Ritchie in his office. But no man can hide from his butler. Come on, T. J.!"

At the Ritchie house they were welcomed with open arms. Lee hurried into the kitchen. There was a familiar figure bent over the stove. Lee grinned.

"Hello—" he said.

Jean didn't answer.

"Why did you run out?"

"You got your job back, didn't you?" Jean said tonelessly.

He just grinned. And then he moved forward a few steps, and before she could turn, he had her in his arms. He kissed her with a sort of decisive crispness. Then he stepped back and said sharply:

"Now, let's get some things straight. First: I love you. . . ."

"Yes, sir," she said, shining-eyed.

"Second: I've got to get Ritchie to listen to me—" quick trick . . .

T. J., clad in a footman's uniform, came hurrying into the kitchen.

"Listen," he said excitedly. "Farenhall is out there. One of the guests. We've got to move fast before he can talk to Ritchie."

Lee frowned; he thought for a moment. Then softly, he said: "The soup!"

That's how it occurred that the new footman, quite carelessly, happened to spill a plate of soup over Mr. Ritchie's gleaming new suit. That meant, of course, that Mr. Ritchie had to change. His new butler was quite sympathetic; he worked quickly and deftly, helping Mr. Ritchie out of his wet clothes. Mr. Ritchie stood a little impatiently waiting for his trousers.

"No trousers," Lee said firmly, "until you listen to me."

"Look here—" Ritchie roared.

"No trousers!"

Mr. Ritchie collapsed: "All right. What's the story?"

The story was simple: Here was Todd's Toys, a fine plant, well-equipped, no manpower shortage. How about a contract? Sign on the dotted line. . . .

"Now can I have my trousers?"

"Of course, sir," said Lee.

"And you'll finish serving dinner?"

"Of course, sir."

Mr. Ritchie signed happily: "Mad town."

Of course the dinner turned out to be slightly unorthodox. The footman, who had bungled with the soup, bungled, too, somehow, with a Baked Alaska, and the whole gooey mess was draped around the protesting puss of one Mr. Farenhall. And there was one rather odd moment when the guests were sure they saw the butler kissing the cook. Not that they could blame the butler. That cook! Some cookie!

the picture, which was just one more thing to attend to before facing the camera. . . . Both Paulette and Fred had such a wonderful, wacky time making the picture that you just can't help feel their enjoyment exuding from the celluloid. The cockeyed sequence of the plot was just their dish. Both of 'em are mad for comedy and have no Hamlet or Lady Macbeth leanings. . . . Edward Arnold, who was borrowed from M-G-M to do his bit as another Babbitt, was busy being the proud papa in off moments. His son just graduated from the air cadet school at Mather Field with such high honors that they are keeping him on as an instructor there. The cast stopped their bucolic chatter long enough to have a good laugh on Arnold. His assignment came through at the last minute, and he was lolling around Sacramento when the rush call from the studio reached him. He made a mad dash for H'wood to get there in time for the first scene and literally came panting on to the set. Lanfield, the director, found him in such a state of exhaustion that they had to call off shooting for the day to give Edward a chance to rest up. . . . Lanfield, too, had his troubles. Right in the middle of the picture he developed a terrific case of laryngitis but wouldn't give in to it. Did his directing by writing instructions on a blackboard, and just sat megaphone-less and voiceless. Then Paulette got the bug, right when they had planned to shoot the rainy night in the park scene. Couldn't wait till she recovered, so compromised on using warmed rain water. . . . Hilary Brooke turned out to be the find of the picture. She handled her part of the rich, spoiled gal so beautifully that Paramount nabbed her right on the spot for a long term contract. The gowns she wears in "Standing Room Only" are out-of-this-world. In fact, Paulette was so crazy about one of them that she had it copied for herself. . . . Roland Young was the only one to add a cosmopolitan touch to the horticultural discussions. He'd just returned from touring in a play and gave with all the latest stage stuff. Right now he's back on his beloved Broadway in "Another Love Story" . . . Porter Hall again drew a double-crossing role, which gave everyone a laugh. Actually you couldn't find a more honest gent anywhere. In H'wood he's a deacon of the First Presbyterian Church!

named Peggy Ryan will finally Get The Guy in the person of one young Donald O'Connor.

Peggy is clinching with Donald in this one, after a succession of pictures in which she had to comfort herself with that corny crack about it being better to have loved and lost, etc., simply because she has a large and articulate group of fans who started to write irate letters to the studio.

One letter in particular is cherished by Peggy. It reads, "Make them let you win Don in your next picture. Gloria Jean is very pretty and she can sing like a choir of canaries, but there's nothing wrong with you, either. Tell them that for us!"

sleuth on the loose . . .

That letter is genuine. Peggy investigated to be sure. The reason for her Nick Charles attitude may be found in an incident that occurred about two years ago and has to do with the Man in Her Life, one Ray Hirsch, currently of the Marine Corps.

In those ancient days back in 1941, Ray was convinced that Universal had in its newly signed ingénue a veritable goldmine of unexploited talent. He had heard that the amount and texture of a contract player's fan mail might well have a bearing on the number and excellence of the parts given that player. Being resourceful, he hit upon a scheme.

Shortly thereafter, Peggy began to get erudite letters from some attorney in Madison, Wisconsin. The attorney was, it seemed, exceptionally interested in Peggy's career. He wanted to know a great deal about the making of pictures. Peggy pestered the technicians for days, then wrote a letter filled with words she had carefully looked up in the dictionary. Back came an answer in no time. Peggy dried her brow and went to work again.

Meanwhile, letters were arriving from the president of a woman's club in Pensacola, the president of a bank in Peoria and a research chemist in Portland. All in all, it was fairly harrowing. Peggy worked with vigor. Finally, when her fancy letters became only a nucleus for a growing body of fan mail, she showed Ray Hirsch her early cap-and-gown correspondence. He tried, but he couldn't control that chuckle. He, personally, had been sending the letters to the postmasters in the various cities, and they in turn had politely mailed them to Peggy.

Peggy first met Ray on October 29, 1941, a date which they celebrate annually with dinner, dancing and appropriate gifts. They became engaged on Valentine's Day (February 14) 1942. Between October and February, the whole world changed.

They had attended church that Sunday morning, December 7, and emerged into the brilliance of California noon sunshine to be confronted by headlines four inches high. Ray, slamming his right fist into the palm of his left hand, announced fiercely that he was going to join the Navy right then. He learned by telephone that the recruiting office would be open Monday. That respite gave Peggy a chance to make a suggestion.

Why not, she said, wait until after Christmas? The holiday was only 18 days away—surely it wouldn't be too criminal for them to have this one Christmas together. Who knew how long the war would last or how many Christmas seasons they might have to spend apart? Ray gave in, reluctantly.

Meanwhile the papers were filled with stories about the valiant stand of the Marine Corps on Wake Island. So—when Ray telephoned Peggy one morning to say that he had enlisted in the Halls of Montezuma—all Peggy could gasp, bloody headlines in her heart, was, "Oh, Ray, why on earth did you do that?"

"If that's the way you feel about it," he said, crestfallen, and hung up.

Peggy called him back to explain that she thought the Marine Corps was super; she just didn't like the things that seemed to happen to the boys, history or no history, medals or no medals. He accepted the apology for himself and for his outfit. He said just wait until she saw him in those greens with the red stripes (maybe).

In February when Ray was a boot, hence practically a military cipher, the Ryans decided to drive down to San Diego to help celebrate his birthday. Peggy roasted a large and luscious chicken and baked a three-story birthday cake with frosting thicker than the snow on Mt. Everest Triumphantly, the three Ryans arrived with the food at the sentry post.

Father Ryan explained that his daughter's boy friend was being forced to celebrate a birthday in the confines of camp and that it wasn't right. He and his family wished to see the boot.

He was told that no boot could see anyone, birthday or not.

Father Ryan, a man with a true Irish tongue, begged to differ. The conversation grew more rugged, and finally the corporal of the guard allowed the Ryans to pass through the gate to petition a commissioned officer.

taxpayers par excellence . . .

At that office, Mr. Ryan became more eloquent than Parnell. He said that his nephew had never been away from home before, and that—with no invasion pounding at our doors—it was absurd to keep the boy away from a birthday cake and a bit of juicy chicken, with maybe now a drumstick for a reasonable officer.

Despite his forensic zeal, Mr. Ryan won only the chance to take up the matter of a few hours freedom for Mr. Hirsch with a higher officer.

He approached this officer with righteous indignation. He said that his son was a good soldier, but hungry. He said that the Ryans were taxpayers, hence actually the employers of the Army, and that as an employer he demanded the right to see his only boy.

FOUR-STAR THRILLER!

It's a breath-catching story! A story of action on battlefronts and lives saved and people comforted. This month the Red Cross must raise $200,000,000. That's a lot of money; it's going to take a lot of giving. But just remember, whether your guy's in Alaska or in the tropics, the Red Cross is with him! GIVE TO THE RED CROSS WAR FUND!

The next scene shows Peggy Ryan and Ray Hirsch seated in the back of Mr. Ryan's sedan. Mr. and Mrs. Ryan tactfully went for a walk and an incidental inspection trip of the camp, in the capacity of taxpayers and Army employers.

Ray ate every smidgen of the chicken, including both wings and the neck. Between bites he managed to explain to Peggy that he had never missed anyone in his entire life as much as he had missed her.

"Honey," he said, "you're for me."

Then he went to work on the cake and devoured it to the last lonesome drop of frosting clinging to the platter. That delightful mission accomplished, Private Hirsch made a statement: "I could spend the rest of my life eating your cooking," he allowed, which sealed the bargain.

A week later he was allowed his first pass; he made good use of it by buying a slim gold ring set with a small, perfect diamond. "It won't ever double for a kleig," he told Peggy, "but it's ours, and it's paid for."

To commemorate the first anniversary of their engagement last spring, Ray gave Peggy a gold cross set with baguette rubies, strung on a delicate gold chain as a lavaliere. Because of Marine salaries, he bought it Dollar Down system. Each time he could come up to Los Angeles, he bounded Pin-up picture for the man who "can't afford" to buy an extra War Bond!

YOU'VE HEARD PEOPLE SAY: "I can't afford to buy an extra War Bond." Perhaps you've said it yourself . . . without realizing what a ridiculous thing it is to say to men who are dying.

Yet it is ridiculous, when you think about it. Because today, with national income at an all-time record high . . . with people making more money than ever before . . . with less and less of things to spend money for . . . practically every one of us has extra dollars in his pocket.

The very least that you can do is to buy an extra $100 War Bond . . . above and beyond the Bonds you are now buying or had planned to buy. In fact, if you take stock of your resources, you will probably find that you can buy an extra $200 . . . or $300 . . . or even $500 worth of War Bonds.

Sounds like more than you "can afford"? Well, young soldiers can't afford to die, either . . . yet they do it when called upon. So is it too much to ask of us that we invest more of our money in War Bonds . . . the best investment in the world today? Is that too much to ask?

traditional Marine enthusiasm and handed Mother Ryan—over Peggy's rapturous shoulder—a small envelope containing the current payment, a task to which Mrs. Ryan had agreed to attend.

Frequently Mr. and Mrs. Ryan join Peggy and Ray in an evening at the Palladium. Mrs. Ryan appears to be about two weeks older than her slim daughter. They are so similar, in fact, that during the run of "Meet the People" in Chicago, Mrs. Ryan doubled for her daughter. It happened the day after Thanksgiving, when Peggy was suffering from turkey-dressing-pumpkin-cranberry-ice cream complications.

Mrs. Ryan idly slipped into one of Peggy's costumes and found that no snap would have to be moved, no tuck would have to be taken. "I know every line you speak, because I've stood in the wings so long," she said tentatively.

"You go on," groaned Peggy, "so I can die happy."

No one would ever have known the difference if an alert newspaper reporter, who had known the Ryans in the old days, hadn't been hep. He made quite a picture spread of the event when Peggy was well enough to be photographed without a greenish tinge.

Ray, who was at one time the national jitterbug champion, has taught Mrs. Ryan to jitter with the poise and accuracy of a Dorsey whirling dervish, but Father Ryan considers such agile antics unbecoming to the mother of a rising star. He dances the samba, the rumba, the tango and several complicated versions of the one-step so beautifully that Mrs. Ryan doesn't mind relinquishing the Suzy Q.

One night Ma and Pa Ryan were just enjoying themselves when the rest of the dancers gradually formed an admiring circle around them . . . exactly as it happens in the movies. Several of the more rhythmic observers beat it out with flat hands.

"Who are they," someone asked Peggy.

"My Dad and Mother," she averred, grinning with pride.

The retort came back incredulously, "If they are anybody's dad and mother that makes me Lewis Stone's big sister. Don't be sil'."

With such a family background it isn't astonishing that Miss Peg performed her first professional dance at the age of 3 for an Elks' Club benefit. She was paid $3.00, or a dollar for each of her years.

When she was four, in the fine tradition of Scarlett O'Hara, she danced in a frilly net dress that her mother had manufactured out of an old lace curtain.

Peggy was six when it became apparent that Mrs. Ryan was too ill to continue to guide her daughter's dancing career, so Peggy was sent to a private school. It was frightening and lonely for a youngster who had always been pals with her family, and she didn't understand it. She gathered, from visits to her mother, that something was seriously wrong, so she decided to do something about it.

peggy's prayers, inc . . .

She instituted what amounted to a prayer league. One after another, she persuaded every enrollee in the school to say one prayer a day for Mrs. Ryan. Once the promise was exacted, she checked up regularly to find out if the petitions were ascending with proper frequency.

Mrs. Ryan began to improve gradually, so Peggy canvassed her schoolmates. "This week could you say two prayers a day instead of just one? Mother's getting better, and I think if we give her a big boost, she'll be well."

When Peggy was eight, Mrs. Ryan was recovered enough to decide to bring her prodigy to Hollywood. They took a small apartment and set out to crash the movies.

One day they made a date for a dancing tryout the following morning, so the Ryan ladies rushed home jubilantly to clean and press one of Peggy's ballet dresses.

"Our great moment!" announced Peggy with considerable exuberance. "Get us—going Hollywood." She leaned with force on the ironing board which promptly collapsed, dropping the iron neatly on one of Peggy's more important toes.

The doctor told them there was nothing to do but to wait for the foot to heal in due time. Peggy danced anyway the next morning, but the effect was more crane-ish than swanlike, so another child got the part. That was one of the bad times.

One of the good times was the celebrated evening when Peggy was signed to dance at the Trocadero, at that period the swankiest spot in town. When she pirouetted out onto the dance floor, her ballet slippers did a six o'clock, and Miss Peggy sat down with force. She collected herself, brushed off her landing gear and made a second attempt to do a junior Spectre de la Rose with full fanny effect.

About this time an ingenious head waiter decided that the floor was possibly a trifle too slick, so the disgruntled danseuse was lifted to a table top and there performed her steps with gusto. When she had finished and was taking repeated bows, Robert Taylor strode across the room, bowed and presented Peggy with one brilliant red rose. She almost swooned.

Years later, the Ryans in force descended upon the Troc as patrons. Peggy and her father walked ahead; Peggy's mother and grandmother came after. As they tripped down the stairs, Mrs. Ryan, Sr., stumbled and almost dived into the center of a nearby table.

"Mama!" cried Mrs. Ryan.

"Mother, are you all right?" demanded Mr. Ryan.

"Madame!" moaned the head waiter.

Grandmother Ryan brushed away helping hands. "Just you never mind," she ordered. "The last time my granddaughter performed on a table here, she was given a red rose. I should do as well."

no grass for grandma . . .

Grandmother has, at other times, had a succinct opinion to express. When Peggy and her parents moved into a bungalow on Cahuenga Boulevard and were discussing the manner in which the small front dooryard should be landscaped, Grandmother said, "Don't sow it to grass for goodness sake. Your father will be so busy he won't have time to cut it, and you girls are so dainty that you don't need the exercise. Plant a good sturdy crop of ivy."

So Peggy planted the entire plot to ivy, watered it religiously and is now rewarded by a fine, dense growth in which you could lose a dachshund forever.

The house itself had been allowed to retrograde by its previous tenants, so Peggy and her Ma painted the walls in each room. That done, they made curtains: ecru for the living room, frilly white crisscross for the bedrooms and plaid gingham for the kitchen and breakfast room. The furniture is blond throughout.

For Peggy's room they made a quilted white satin spread with a matching bolster and bought thick white string rugs. Peggy, with several yards of white net and blue-barred taffeta, built herself a dressing table that looks like something filched from the star department at the Metropolitan.

Peggy's next ambition, if the acting department continues to be so successful (and those who know insist that her career is just getting well started on a terrific upsweep), is to buy her parents a substantial house in some comfortable suburb.

Peggy's father, who is a color engineer for Technicolor, says he is still head of the household, thank you, and Missy will take orders from him about how she squanders her money on others. When he wants a house, he will buy it.

But Peg and her mother exchange knowing smiles. A man has his pride and his own plans, of course, but what chance has he against the guile of two pixies?

advice to the lovelorn . . .

Speaking of careers, Peggy's has grown right along with that of Donald O'Connor, and the two are practically soul mates in a casual sort of way. She asks him for advice on the Technique of Handling a Man. She wants to know, should she buy Ray this present or that? Don tells her. When she and Ray have one of their very, very rare misunderstandings, she tells Don a highly involved story about two anonymous friends of hers who have argued about such and such.

Don, from the heights of utter impartiality, hands down a decision . . . usually in favor of his fellow male being. Even if it's partisan, it's helpful.

On the other hand Peggy needles Don into doing many of the gallant and thoughtful things that endear a man to a girl. She reminds him to send flowers to his hostess after a social affair and urges him to write thank-you notes to those who have done him a favor.

Together, they commit grand larceny upon any and all scenes in which they appear. The understanding is that they will never steal from each other, but that whenever possible they will filch the camera interest from other players. They aren't certain yet how successful they were in this attempt when they appeared with Richard Dix in "Top Man." Mr. Dix is an old hand at the game himself. Whenever they thought they had a particularly hot bit of business scheduled, Mr. Dix went before the camera with a few tricks just a trifle more torrid.

Unprejudiced onlookers have expressed a desire to see Peggy and Don work in a picture with Mickey Rooney, no slouch at dramatic theft himself.

That the relationship between Don and Peggy is antiseptically platonic is indicated by his answer when a friend asked him why he didn't date a terrific number like Miss Ryan. "We go out on double dates," he explained. "Gwen and I, Peggy and Ray. But I've never had a real date with Peggy because, after all, she's engaged. I mean, she's engaged to be married."

After placing great emphasis on that last phrase, he added, "But she's the swellest girl in the world."

That says it.

Newcomers You Should Know:

As you read this item, the name John Harvey probably means very little to you unless you saw the New York production of "Kiss and Tell." In that case, your eyebrows will be up to here with anticipation, and your ears will be extended like the hand of a six-year-old at the word "candy" for news of Mr. Harvey.

John is tall, brown and humorous. He is under contract to 20th Century-Fox and is currently working in "Four Jills and a Jeep." Before that he made "Pin-up Girl" with Betty Grable.

The reason Señor Harvey is important to you readers—pending the release of his pictures—is the fact that he has thought up, in the secrecy of his nifty noodle, a neat gift gadget for his wife. He has started a gold charm bracelet; for each picture he makes, he will add an item to his wife's collection. At present the bracelet consists of a heart (with a picture of John engraved on the outside) for "Pin-up Girl," and a gold jeep for "Four Jills, etc."

Brain Gain:

Did you know that Sonny Tufts has established a scholarship at Yale for some outstanding student each year? When asked if he had specified the course that such a student must take, he said with a grin, "Nope. What good would it do? After all I'm an actor, yet my degree is in anthropology."

Don't let anyone tell you that Carole Landis' book was written by anybody but herself. It happened while she was in New York. She was sitting in her hotel one night, reading, when the thought struck her—as it has you and me—"Why don't I write a book?"

So she did. So three publishers bid on it. There is no particular surprise in her success as anyone who has ever interviewed Carole will be glad to tell you that she handles words the way Harry James handles brass.

Brass Buttons:

Originally, Lt. Robert Taylor had planned to be home for Christmas. His graduation ceremony, awarding him Navy wings, was to have taken place on December 20. However, flying conditions had been so bad at his training field that not enough flying hours could be accumulated, so the ceremony had to be moved forward several weeks. This meant that he couldn't get to Hollywood for the holidays, and Barbara Stanwyck was working in a picture, so she couldn't get away. Thus the Taylors, like many another service family, were separated during the holidays.

Last summer, when George Montgomery was a-courtin' Dinah Shore, she said on several occasions, "Shall we stop at my sister's house and take her kids to the beach with us?"

The children consisted of (1) Peter and (2) Linda. Peter had met George on several occasions and was so impressed with that rugged gentleman that he refused to answer to his own name thereafter. "You should have named me George," he announced. "That's what I want to be called from now on."

Last fall Peter and Linda, along with their parents, were transferred to an Army post in Texas. Their father, Captain Maurice Seligman, is a flight surgeon attached to the Army Air Corps.

Recently, through one of those inexplicable military happenstances, George Montgomery found himself stationed temporarily at the same camp and was invited repeatedly to the Seligman home.

And here, the question of military rank arose. As a gag, Captain Seligman explained to Corporal Montgomery that the corporal must salute and remain standing while the captain consumed his own morning cereal and/or fruit cup, and that of Corporal Montgomery as well.

It was a good gag, but it didn't work because the first morning it was tried, Peter-George set up such a howl in behalf of his hero that military courtesy had to go by the boards out of respect for the neighbors' ears.

Two Navy ensigns were driving along the highway, bound for Alameda Air Base, when their car sputtered and swooned by the wayside. They checked gas, oil and battery. They checked distributor points. They couldn't discover the woe. Finally they decided that, because of the hour, they must leave Betsy to her lonely devices beside the highway and thumb their way to the station.

The blond ensign stepped a few paces down the highway and assumed as pathetic an air as possible while his fellow traveler tinkered listlessly with the car. Whiz went one car; whiz went another; zip went a third. No ride.

The blond ensign was joined by his buddy, who had given up the car as a lost cause. Still the cars whizzed by shooting back a prop wash that threatened to give the thumbers a severe case of pneumonia.

They waited five, ten, fifteen minutes. Twenty, thirty, forty. The situation was well out of hand. "I've got an idea," said the dark member of the duo and turned the spotlight on his blond buddy. Believe it or not, a car stopped. It was, however, a U.S.O. vehicle and would have picked up the stranded pair regardless of any consideration except their uniform.

Safely back at base, the dark gentleman began to rib the light gentleman. "And to think that any one of those cars would have stopped in a minute if they had known who you were," he laughed. "Just for an autograph, they would have stopped."

The blond ensign was Robert Stack.

When Frances Neal answered the telephone one afternoon, she was astonished to learn that the caller was the transoceanic telephone operator and that Lt. Van Heflin was going to call his wife in 36 hours. This precall arrangement has been found to be the only possible way in which calls can be completed.

For 36 hours Frances moved in a mist of vital questions to be asked, messages to be delivered and a combination of both.

An hour before the call was put through, the operator called again and explained certain restrictions. During a transoceanic conversation, one may not ask what clothes a man is wearing nor how the weather is. One may not refer to any cablegrams or letters previously written.

At last, Van's voice came over the wires. All his overjoyed wife could think of to say was, "Honey, are you well?" and, "Darling, it's so wonderful to hear the sound of your voice."

And—very important—"Yes, honey, Vanna is getting along fine; she looks more like you every day."

Here is one of the stories just coming to ear, after the whirlwind departure of the Great Mature. When he entered the foyer of the studio publicity department for the first time since his active duty with the Coast Guard, he uttered a yelp of pain upon noting the pictures framed upon the walls. On one side of the lobby were enlarged photographs of Tyrone Power in uniform and John Payne likewise; on the opposite side were two glamour girl shots.

"'S an outrage," announced Vic, storming through the halls. "I'm the only guy on the lot who has seen active service overseas, and do I get my picture in the rogue's gallery? Do I? Fine thing!"

Although he kidded the issue, those who knew him well realized that Vic was a little hurt by the oversight, so a matching picture of The Hunk suddenly appeared on the wall above Ty and John.

This, of course, was one of his minor accomplishments. He swept into town like a tornado. He was everywhere at once. He entered more night clubs than the beverage shortage, and he created more laughs than Skelton on a load of feathers. He was a dynamo, a titan. After he had gone, a friend drew a deep breath and described The Hunk: "He's a trim craft about the size of a dinghy, but he's powered with four Pratt & Whitney engines at full throttle."

It was a great day at Paramount when the fair-haired boy of the lot, Alan Ladd, came home from the wars. Word had spread throughout all departments that he would arrive around nine A.M. for the first day of shooting on "And Now Tomorrow," so glad hands were thrust from every doorway, and there were Welcome Home signs festooned from set to set and from roof to roof.

He waded through a thousand greetings and shook hands by the hundred. His voice was getting weak, his back had a distinctly tender spot from the good-natured thumpings he had taken, and he was ready for a breather when he reached the stage on which he was to work.

There, he found that in the midst of all the gala celebration, one colossal detail had been neglected. No one had thought to supply him with that one most important possession of a star: his portable dressing room. It was still languishing in storage.

Bing Singing:

There is an epigram to the effect that if you cast bread upon the waters, it will return as milk toast.

Tenny rate, in the Paramount music department there works a girl named Jeanette Mendelson who is a celebrated do-gooder. Several years ago she was working in New York and knew, because they dropped into her office regularly, a group of ambitious but starving singers called The Rhythm Boys. A good deal of the time they were suffering from hunger, so Jeanette always brought along several extra sandwiches in her luncheon. When any of the boys—and usually it was all three —dropped in, she would complain loudly about her inability to enjoy a peaceful luncheon hour and would mention sadly the drying condition of the food she wasn't going to have time to eat. The boys always came to her rescue at this point and disposed of the food to keep it from spoiling.

Zip denotes the passing of time which moves Jeanette from New York to Hollywood. At her desk recently she found that she wasn't going to have time to go to the Commissary, so telephoned and asked them to send a salad, a sandwich and a pot of coffee to her office so that she could have a desk luncheon and so continue her work.

Along the corridors there came, in due time, the genial crooning of one Mr. Bing Crosby, formerly of The Rhythm Boys. He had been in the commissary when Miss Mendelson's order came in, so he had become a singing waiter in memory of the times when he had been a waiting singer.

C'est La Guerre:

When the Victory Committee was arranging itineraries for the stars who left during Christmas week to entertain at Army camps throughout the United States, they approached Lucille Ball apologetically. They explained that not every tour was equally pleasant. There were some camps where accommodations were limited in the extreme and where adjacent towns were so small that only the most rugged of quarters were available. As an illustration, they cited one particular camp and described the surrounding countryside. It sounded like the atmospheric setting for a Boris Karloff picture.

To put it briefly they were breaking the news to Lucille that she had drawn a scroungy assignment. Lucille, nevertheless, was all sweetness and light. She said that a camp in such a locality undoubtedly needed entertainment far more desperately than some of the more pleasantly situated training spots. She would be glad to go, she said with a secret smile, regardless of problems entailed.

What she didn't confide was that her sister's husband happened—by one of those amazing coincidences—to be stationed at that camp, and her sister was living in a tiny house in the nearby village. It appeared that in Lucille's case she was to have the satisfaction of being patriotic and having a wonderful Christmas visit with her sister at the same time.

Two days before Lucille was to leave, she received a jubilant telephone call from the Los Angeles Union Station. It was her sister; her husband had been granted a 14-day furlough, so the pair had sped to Los Angeles to spend the holidays with Lucille.

Altogether, Lucille and her relatives managed to spend three days together—in Los Angeles.

When Humphrey Bogart and his wife, Mayo Methot, left for overseas on an entertainment tour, M'sieu Bogart dragged out his old trunk, a relic of the time when Bogie served an enlistment in the Navy. On the side was neatly stenciled the legend, H. Bogart, Seaman, 1st class.

Upon arrival at their first port of call, Bogie discovered that he was utterly without luggage. It seems that the Navy, spotting its own, had shipped the trunk to some unannounced destination with other Navy luggage. So Bogie borrowed some G.I. fatigue clothes to give his one shirt a much needed rest.

dages, and there appears to be a small but nasty scar on his thumb.

Some time ago a friend of Mr. Tufts was bitten by a pet dog. "If you keep pets that bite," ribbed Sonny, "you have to expect occasional demonstrations. Me, I keep a bird."

The bird is a macaw; his conversational gifts are extensive. The only trouble with him is that he likes to sleep all day and to describe his dreams in ringing tones all night, a habit distasteful to the tired Tufts. One Sunday, Sonny decided to teach the macaw a lesson. Every time Feathers went to sleep, Sonny inserted a hand between the bars of the cage and stirred him until he awakened, blinking.

This went on all day, a contest between Sonny and slumber. The macaw, at first puzzled, went rapidly from bewilderment to fury. The next time he dozed, only to be rudely startled by a human hand, Feathers took a good, juicy, deep bite out of it.

Sonny has told his dog-loving friend that he battered his hand when he ran into a door.

Sub-Par Car:

There was a time in Utopia-On-the-Pacific when a star was known by the car he kept. Currently, however, a paintless kiddie car with an outboard motor which will get 30 miles to a gallon is considered le cabriolet parfait. Ella Raines drives an alleged motor with a finish like a hopeless case of smallpox and more squeaks than a convention of mice. But it gets wonderful mileage.

Recently Ella picked up four sailors and drove them to their destination. "What do you do?" one of the blues asked.

"I'm an actress," replied Ella.

The middies exchanged glances. Three of them suppressed polite smiles, but the fourth observed, "Driving a heap like this, you sure prove that you're in the chips, Sister. But I'm all for you. Always give yourself a build-up, I say."

Dream Sack Lack:

The Schoonover family, of which Gloria Jean is one of the most remarkable members, have been having their troubles. The first thing that happened was that the house they had been renting was sold from under them. By dint of great ingenuity and physical effort they found a house in North Hollywood and bought it. The former tenants were returning to the midwest, so took their furniture with them, and the Schoonovers were faced with the stupendous task of equipping a home.

Beds, of course, were the major problem. After shopping like mad for days, they finally ordered a complete feather equipment. It was to be delivered on a Tuesday morning, but nothing arrived. Nor Tuesday noon. Nor Tuesday afternoon. When the evening paper arrived, they learned that the store from which they had ordered their dream sacks had burned down.

That night they slept on the floor. The next day they started their shopping all over again. It required three days for the mattresses (victory type) to be delivered.

Yes, they all had colds. And stiff necks. And a new respect for G.I.s who go out on five-day bivouacs.

Social Scene:

One of the great cinematic social events of December was the premiere of "The Song of Bernadette" starring sensitive, beautiful Jennifer Jones. The premiere itself was held at Carthay Circle Theater, an impressive showplace halfway between Los Angeles and Beverly Hills. Absent, of course, were the elaborate gowns and jewelry that used to supply the dazzle for such occasions, but very Corporal George Montgomery and his auburn-haired Dinah were there; so were Colonel Tom Lewis and his lovely wife, Loretta Young, Jack Benny and Mary Livingstone, Don and Honore Ameche, Lana Turner and Steve Crane, Mary Pickford and Lt. Buddy Rogers, Hedy Lamarr and John Loder, Mr. and Mrs. Edward G. Robinson, the Fred MacMurrays.

Lon McCallister brought Marjorie Riordan and stood around in agony for several moments, wondering what to do next. He had discovered, when he dived into his pocket for the tickets, that he had forgotten them. It didn't occur to modest "California" that all he had to do was to approach the box office, say "Hello" to the girl there who would have recognized him instantly and supplied replacements. Duplicate ticket stubs had been prepared for just such emergencies, which was a lucky thing for your Good News correspondent as she, also, left her tickets safely on the desk in her office.

As it was, Lon—getting pinker by the moment—struggled through the crowds until he found a studio representative, then explained his dilemma. "My boy," quoth the flabbergasted 20th Century employee to Lon, "just stay as sweet as you are. Such modesty is not only refreshing, but practically unknown hereabouts."

Since it was not only Jennifer Jones' first picture but undoubtedly that which will make her a star, she had been planning for weeks to attend. She had bought a short dress and a long dress, so as to be properly prepared for either a simple or a grand debut. She had her hair done. But the night of the preview she was given instruction—according to intimate friends—to stay at home. Jennifer is under contract to D. O. Selznick and made "Bernadette" on loan-out to 20th Century. Recently she has been working for Selznick in a picture titled "Since You Went Away."

The local presumption is that she is being saved for that premiere so that she can first appear before press and public under the aegis of her contract holder. Such a plan may have been good business, but it was a bad break for the girl who has already had her share of Hollywood heartache.

Quickies:

Rudy Vallee's time is no longer our time. It all belongs to the new Mrs. Vallee, née Bettyjane Greer, who recently married the curly-haired Coast Guard lieutenant in a ceremony held at the Westwood Village Community Chapel. Miss Greer set a bridal precedent by wearing a long-sleeved gold lamé dress, the long skirt of which was slit to the knee in front. Her hat was brown velvet with a starched brown veil. The groom wore the conventional naval uniform and an ecstatic beam.

Also married this month were Robert Hutton (for whom Warner Brothers is holding out high hopes) and Natalie Thompson.

Brenda Marshall Holden has been supplied by her husband with nicotine-less cigarettes. Purpose: to help her get rid of that small, throaty cough. By the time you read this, her son, Westy, will be four months old.

Judy Garland and Tom Drake, the Metro sensation who will knock you flatter than an ungummed postage stamp when you see "Meet Me In St. Louis," have found each other.

Gene Tierney is currently back in Hollywood, at work on "A Tree Grows in Brooklyn." She left her small daughter, Darici, in Washington, D. C., with Mrs. Tierney because the Cassini house is rented, and Gene had no place to live. Cobina Wright, Jr., insisted that Gene move in with her until she could find quarters.

CHIP OFF THE OLD BLOCK

Donald (Don O'Connor) on suspension from Naval Academy, dates Glory (Ann Blyth) on train. Peg (Peggy Ryan) botches things by dewy-eyed greeting.

You can't help liking Donald O'Connor any more than you could help liking a cocker spaniel puppy. They have the same exuberance, the same endearing appeal. Donald, who in real life sticks to one girl like gum to your shoe, has a new leading lady in every picture. This one is Ann Blyth, pretty and charming, who can sing like the well-known nightingale. As usual, Peggy Ryan is around, trying to get Donald to view her with something beside a caustic brotherliness, and getting nowhere. Arthur Treacher, the world's most famous butler, is in the cast, too, playing—yeah, sure, a butler!

Donald is in trouble right from the picture's start. It's tough when you're in love with a girl, and you find out that her mother and your father used to be in love but quarreled and parted. Ditto for her grandmother and your grandfather. It sort of creates a family tradition.

Glory Marlowe III (Ann (Continued on page 8)

Don finds Dad once loved and squabbled with Glory's Mom. Feud goes back to grandparents. (With Quiz Kid Joel Kupperman, Irving Bacon.)

More trouble when Don suspects Dad is a spy. Peggy phones Glory to explain she was only "hamming" at station, is practically sister to Don. Relieved, Glory asks them to "welcome home" party where plot really starts spinning.

Blyth) has a famous actress for a mother and an even more famous one for a grandmother. But they are definitely allergic to Corrigans, and Donald is a Corrigan. Glory doesn't know about the tradition when she meets Donald on a train on her way home from Honolulu. He is going to New York on an extended leave from Naval Academy. Extended by the head of the Academy—"and don't come back until you can behave yourself!" Everything is fine on the train. But when they get to New York, Peggy, a young actress (Peggy Ryan), is at the train to meet Donald, and she greets him with a scene that would have done justice to Juliet! Glory looks the situation over and goes off with her nose in the air, while Donald tries to shake Peggy off. When he follows Glory to her home, he runs into the anti-Corrigan campaign waged by Glory I (Helen Broderick) and Glory II (Helen Vinson), aided and abetted by Quentin (Arthur Treacher), a retired stage butler.

Don goes dejectedly off to his father's apartment, and there the first thing he hears is his dad (Patric Knowles) talking in surreptitious whispers to some guy with a Teutonic accent about "secret plans" and such. The conversation goes on with, "Be sure you aren't suspected" and, "Let's settle the money part of the deal." Obviously Donald's father, a commander in the Navy, has become a spy! Well, anyway, it seems obvious to Donald, who is worried half out of his wits.

He does manage to solve one problem, though. He persuades Peggy to call up Glory and explain that the scene at the station was just the "ham" coming out in her and that Donald is not really her "one and own true love" as she indicated at that time. Glory is relieved to hear it. She really likes Donald a lot and thinking about Peggy hasn't done her peace of mind any good. Now she's so happy that she invites them both to her "welcome home" party. When they arrive and find the place full of producers and theatrical celebrities, Peggy almost knocks herself out trying to attract attention. Glory sings a song, which delights everyone. Then Peggy makes Donald do a dance with her, but by then all the producers have adjourned to the library. They are in a huddle with Glory I and Glory II, persuading them to let Glory III star in a show. Everyone finally agrees that it's a good idea—except Glory III. She's been planning to do some special war work, and anyway she doesn't care about the theater. Donald persuades her to agree, and the producers sigh with relief. But the sigh changes to a scream of anguish when he adds firmly "on condition that all profits go to war relief."

Glory goes into the show, and Donald is sent back to the Naval Academy, to spend the next week worrying over the "spy" angle. But things happen fast when you get kids like Glory and Peggy and Donald as catalytic agents. The first thing you know, all the problems are solved, and everything's "very okay"!—Univ.

P. S.

This was Don O'Connor's next-to-the-last epic before reporting for Army duty. . . . Production marks the cinematic debut of famous Quiz Kid Joel Kupperman, who was not aware of the rumors that he had been hired not only to act but to figure out the income tax of the studio's top executives. . . . Joel learned his lines

Feeling useless as a steak knife? Cadet Nurse Corps is a life-saver for you . . . and a couple dozen doughboys!

Last month we told you that henceforward "Co-ed" would be strictly love stuff, and here we go reneging on you right off the bat. Can you forgive us just this once? If we ask you very, very pretty please? If we give you an awful good reason?

Came a letter in our mail that really got us. It said: "I want to know all there is to know about the United States Cadet Nurse Corps. Why? Well, you see, there's a guy. He was wounded in Italy, and he'd be dead now if it weren't for an Army Nurse. She went without sleep for more than forty-eight hours to take care of him. She followed the doctor's orders to the letter—plasma, morphine—the usual routine for a lad who'd bled a lot and who hurt like anything. But he was too low for medicine alone to help. She knew it, and she stayed with him hour after hour, holding his good hand (the left one's gone) and talking him into fighting back at death. She did a job. He's well again, and he wrote me yesterday, 'Tell every nurse you see to come on over, the war's fine. Seriously, though, we could use dozens more of them. Why aren't they coming (Continued on page 24) quickly, explained it was just like memorizing multiplication tables, only with words instead of numbers. . . . Mr. and Mrs. Kupperman and sister Harriet made the trip with young Joel, convoyed him safely through a maze of luncheons, guest appearances, radio broadcasts. . . . Asked what he liked best in Hollywood, seven-year-old diplomat Kupperman answered, "Everything". . .. Director Charles Lamont decided to save wear and tear on his vocal chords and began summoning young Ann Blyth to the set via an old-fashioned school bell. Ann is just 17 years old, has to spend three hours each day in school. Class hours don't run in consecutive sequence, so Ann has to grab lessons between scenes wherever she and her teacher can find a quiet spot. The bell idea went over big with everyone but Peggy Ryan. Kidded Peggy, "Sure, it saves your voice—but what about our ear drums?" Peggy herself, now 18, is enjoying her first year out of school, sadly tsk-tsks at the sight of Ann struggling with her daily homework. . . . Picture has had three name changes, final one chosen to follow pattern of Don's other films, "Mr. Big," "Top Man." . . . Kids had real acting competition from experts Helen Broderick and Ernest Truex, both of whom were top stage stars years before they came to Hollywood. Helen and Truex spent their spare time between scenes recalling favorite curtain speeches, punch lines from their long careers.

COVER GIRL

It takes something pretty special to be a Cover Girl. The kind of thing Jinx Falkenburg has, and Betty Jane Hess. Just the words "Cover Girl' have come to mean glamour. There's plenty of glamour and beauty in this picture, but there's a lot more than that. There's a lovely red-haired dancer from Brooklyn, who becomes a Cover Girl overnight. And a man who's in love with her and wants her to be successful, but not the easy way. And another man who offers her the world of diamonds and mink and caviar every night for dinner. It's quite a story—I think you're going to like it, and the people in it.

SEE YOU AGAIN APRIL 11!

Rita Hayworth plays the dancer, Rusty. Rusty works in a "joint" in Brooklyn—Danny McGuire's place. Danny (Gene Kelly) knows his place is a joint. It has to be, he hasn't the money to make it anything else. But he runs it right, and he has ambition. Maybe some day he and Rusty will have a real place. "Oh well, what's the use of just dreaming?" Danny says. "Hard work is the thing—that's the way dreams come true." But Rusty gets tired of it. Rehearsals all the while and her feet hurting. So, unknown to Danny, she goes to New York to enter "Vanity" magazine's Cover Girl contest.

She sees Miss Jackson (Eve Arden), the wisecracking editor, and then Mr. Coudair (Otto Kruger), the publisher. Mr. Coudair is entranced with Rusty. She's definitely the girl he wants on the cover. So everything's fine, isn't it? Everything but telling Danny. Once the cover appears, nobody has to be told anything. The columnists and reporters attend to that. Danny's place is swamped with photographers, sob sisters and baskets of red roses. The latter arrive every hour on the hour and are from a producer named Wheaton (Lee Bowman), who is determined to get Rusty in his show if it takes every rose in New York. The rest is an exciting romantic tangle, with the "Cover Girls" featured in a number that's a honey. La Hayworth is gorgeous in Technicolor, and Gene is as good as he was in "Pal Joey."—Col.

P. S.

"Cover Girl," in case there is anyone who doesn't know, is a phrase describing a young beauty who has become famous through having her face appear on the cover of one or more national magazines. . . . Fifteen beauties were brought to Hollywood by Anita Colby, dean of the cover girls, and ensconced in a huge mansion rented for them by Columbia studios. . . . Only one of them not called by name in the film is Dusty Anderson, "Farm Journal's" choice. Her name was too similar to "Rusty," Rita Hayworth's character name in the picture. . . . Mexico has officially adopted Jinx Falkenburg as the ideal American Tourist—by order of Señor Alejandro Buelna, chief of the Departmento de Turismo. . . . In one of the most spectacular dance scenes, strips of tinfoil one inch long drift down from a studio mountain top. Between takes, every bit of the silvery stuff had to be picked up for the next shot. All the experts' ingenuity couldn't figure out a way to do it quickly. A magnet wouldn't work; neither would a vacuum cleaner. Picking them up by hand was the only way. . . . Rita got a bit cloud-sick during her dance among the synthetic cumuli. And having to trip gaily down a narrow trail with sheer drop-offs on each side (no hand rail) didn't help her unhappy tummy one bit. . . . Biggest event of the production, outside of the picture itself, was the marriage of Rita to Orson Welles. Entire cast and crew knocked off work and staged an impromptu party when she returned to finish her scenes for the day. . . . Most elaborate costume Rita wears is a red velvet costermonger outfit studded with 1866 white pearl buttons. Required the full time of wardrobe mistress Roselle Novello to check before each take to see if Rita had all her buttons!

SONG OF RUSSIA

This will probably be Robert Taylor's swan song to pictures for the duration, since he has joined the Navy. Quite a song it is, too, combining stirring Russian music with a tender love story and a background of war.

Bob (he's almost unbearably handsome in this role) plays an American composer who goes to Russia on a concert tour. The tour is arranged by his manager, Hank (Robert Benchley), but it is no part of Hank's plan that John should fall in love with a Russian girl. However, love has a way of catching up with us when we least expect it. It catches up with John in Moscow.

The girl is Nadya (Susan Peters), who has come from a little village near Smolensk to ask him if he will attend their music festival there the next month. John talks to her, listens to her play the piano, gazes into her eyes. "This," he says firmly to Hank, "is the girl to show me Russia." They have some happy days together in Moscow, but then Nadya steals away, back to her own village. She is sure that the difference in their background is too great—that the famous composer can't really love her, as he says.

John comes to her village for the festival, and this time he will have no nonsense about backgrounds. They are married, amid the delighted approval of the villagers and set off on his concert tour together. They are far too wrapped up in each other to notice the threatening signs of war. Until that black day when the Germans march into Russia. Nadya—a Russian before anything else—leaves immediately for home to do what she can to help. John must go on with his concert tour. But when he hears that the Nazis are near Smolensk, he drops all his plans and hurries away to be with Nadya. The journey to the village is a perilous one. John must take his chances with German bombers and advance guards of Nazi soldiers. What he sees along the way, and the scenes of desolation that greet his arrival, show us the strong, bitter courage of the Russian people. The ending is not only romantic but a tribute to Russo-American friendship.

Susan Peters lives up to her earlier promise in her portrayal of Nadya. John Hodiak is excellent in a small part. And you'll love the music!—M-G-M.

P. S.

Metro turned tattle tale when studio bosses discovered Susan Peters was taking a long swim in the Pacific every morning before reporting to work—called her mother, with whom she lives while in Hollywood, and requested that she put a stop to this dangerous morning routine. . . . Susan's mother assured the front office that she knew of this habit and fully approved. Seems Susie has been an excellent swim-

Jean: With all the men she's got, you'd think she'd let my date alone! I'd like to give her a piece of my mind. Bob's skated more with her than with me!

They took a few test scenes, and Dr. Coates got the job. . . . A few of the battle scenes were filmed in the Cheviot Hills section of Los Angeles the day after an air raid alert. Just as explosives were set off to simulate a Nazi attack, a flight of U. S. bombers flew overhead. Inside of ten minutes six local air raid wardens had reported for duty. . . . Several hundred Hollywood extras stood on tired and aching feet for three days during a concert sequence—the band was playing "The Star Spangled Banner." . . . Bob Benchley turned his portable dressing room into a business office and wrote the first three of a series of short film subjects he is doing for the Government. . . . Director Gregory Ratoff was up to his usual standards for demanding authenticity in his sets. The Soviet farmhouse is an exact replica of a Russian home, and the pictures on the wall are of Mr. R. as a small boy—taken at his home in Moscow.

THE SULLIVANS

This is the funniest, saddest, truest, most human picture you've ever seen. You remember the Sullivan boys. The five brothers who were lost when the Juneau went down? This is their story, and don't stay away because you think it's going to be war and tragedy and stuff. You'll laugh harder than you have in months, believe me. And if you shed a couple of tears at the end, they're the kind that will do you good.

The Sullivan family are as Irish as County Down. "Pop" Sullivan (Thomas Mitchell) is a brakeman on the railroad that runs past their little frame house in Waterloo, Iowa. The kids are crazy about "Pop," but they have to look out for his quick temper. "Mom" (Selena Royle) is the one they turn to for comfort and arbitration in the constant disputes that crop up between five lively boys and their sister.

The story begins when the boys are all at the sliding-down-bannisters age. All but little Al (Bobby Driscoll), who lands on the floor in a sitting position every time he tries it. Al is determined to do everything his older brothers do. He spends most of his time chasing frantically after them, yelling, "Hey, fellers, wait for me!" But when the Sullivan boys are in a fight—and that's pretty often—Al's right in there punching with the rest of them.

Those kids can get in more trouble than you ever saw! Usually with the best intentions in the world. Like the time they wanted to make a woodbox for Mom and ended by cutting a large hunk out of the side of the house (in zero weather), breaking a water pipe and turning the kitchen into a skating rink.

Of course when they grow up, things are different. They are still getting into jams but of a different kind. Al falls deeply in love with a girl named Katherine Mary (Anne Baxter). His older brothers think it's puppy love and decide to break it up. But they end by going, en masse, to Katherine Mary to apologize.

They're wonderful kids. You'll love them. And you'll understand why even the Navy couldn't separate them. The fighting Sullivans always stick together!

Watch particularly for Bobby Driscoll playing "Al" as a child, and Edward Ryan as "Al" grown up. Thomas Mitchell is wonderful as "Pop," and Anne Baxter plays Katherine Mary with charming sincerity.—20th-Fox.

P. S.

"The Sullivans" is based on the real life story of the five Sullivan brothers from Waterloo, Iowa, who were lost in the sinking of the cruiser Juneau in November '42 But it's not a war picture. Sam Jaffe and Lloyd Bacon, after talking to Mom and Dad Sullivan, decided on a comedy of family life. Actual combat lasts three and a half minutes on the screen. . . . Mom and Pop visited set. The movie was shot in Santa Rosa, masquerading as Waterloo, Iowa. On a blistering, 104 degree day, they shot the snow scenes—sprinkled ersatz flakes on the sweltering streets. . . . Three of the boys, Eddie Ryan, James Cardwell and John Campbell wound up with long termers at 20th because of their wonderful acting. Toughest thing for Jimmy C. was learning to ride a motorcycle. Took him two weeks.

THREE CHEERS FOR THE BOYS

Married people quarrel over the silliest things! And then they're both too stubborn to say they're sorry, and the misunderstandings pile up, and the marriage goes on the rocks. That's what happens to Tony West (George Raft) and Gloria Vance (Zorina). Tony is used to being the boss—he has managed the "Three Wests," a vaudeville unit, most of his life. When vaudeville dies, he leaves his father (Charles Grapewin) and his sister Kitty (Grace McDonald) in New York, and starts for Hollywood and pictures. There he meets Gloria, who is a dancing star. In spite of the fact that Tony is only a "gentleman of the ensemble," he manages to high-pressure Gloria into thinking she needs a dance partner. Him. It really works, too, and the Vance-West combination becomes a spectacular click with the box-office.

You'd think Tony could relax a little, then. Well, he does take time off to marry Gloria. But then they go right back to work, and he just doesn't ever get around to remembering anniversaries or saying, "Darling, I love you." And the war comes along. Tony can't get into the Army because of a bad heart, but he starts organizing show business into units to tour the camps, eventually even go overseas. He's the busiest guy in Hollywood. And Gloria? Well, Gloria has a little secret she'd like to tell Tony if she could ever catch him when he wasn't at a meeting or on the long distance telephone or away on tour. But Tony goes on being "too busy," and finally Gloria walks out on him. Without telling the secret.

They are both hurt, and both bewildered by what's happened to them. If they could only talk things over—but something always intervenes. So Tony books himself and his father and his sister as a U.S.O. unit to go to Australia. Louie (Charles Butterworth) and his dog Fifi, who were in vaudeville with the Wests, go along. So does Sophie Tucker and the Andrews sisters. Their boat is destined never to reach Australia, but at the end of the picture there are still "The Three Wests" doing their bit for America.

You never saw such a fabulous number of guest stars. Charles Boyer, W. C. Fields, Donald O'Connor—dozens of them. Better go, or you'll miss your favorite.—Univ.

P. S.

Zorina does her first professional ballroom dancing in this picture. Also does two solos—a beguine and a ballet jitterbug number, done in front of a line of chorus boys. Used her last two pair of open-meshed lastex hose for these dances . . . will have to have her legs painted in all numbers for the duration. . . . "Black and white" dance sequence, which is done by white-costumed dance teams on a black masonite floor, was shot on the former "Phantom of the Opera" set. . . . Unable to get suitable dancing shoes for her solo ballet, Zorina dyed the pair she wore in "Louisiana Purchase". . . . The mute horn played by Charlie Spivak is his own invention. He calls it a "Whispo" because it can be played so softly, it can't be heard by anyone standing more than three feet away. Charlie spent six months perfecting the instrument—stuffed silk, satin, rags, paper and cardboard into the bell of his trumpet until he had the desired effect. Felt the horn should be muted to a bare whisper to bring out the pulsating rhythm of the beautiful "Besame Mucho."

PASSAGE TO MARSEILLES

Remember "Casablanca"? Who could forget it! Now Warner Brothers again gives us the famous Humphrey Bogart—Sydney Greenstreet—Claude Rains—Peter Lorre combination. They also toss in Michele Morgan, Helmut Dantine, Philip Dorn and John Loder as nonchalantly as if stars were raisins in a rice pudding. With a cast to knock your eye out, it's no wonder the picture's a super-thriller.

At an airport on the English coast, an American newspaperman (John Loder) is listening to a strange story. It's told him by a Free French captain, Freycenet (Claud Rains), and he knows it must be true. But it still sounds pretty fantastic.

"At the beginning of this war," Freycenet says, "I was on my way to France on a freighter, from New Caledonia. In the middle of the sea we came to what we at first thought was a bit of floating wreckage. Mais non, it was a canoe, of the most primitive. In it were five men, half dead of exposure and thirst."

The men are, of course, taken aboard the freighter. One of the passengers on board, Major Duval (Sydney Greenstreet), immediately suspects them of being exactly what they are—convicts who have escaped from that most sinister of all prisons, Devil's Island. He does his best to trap them into admitting it, but the men led by Matrac (Humphrey Bogart) are too clever for him.

When the news of France's surrender reaches the freighter by wireless, Duval, who is a Fascist sympathizer, and his friends, try to take over the boat for Petain. But the convicts join forces with the true Frenchmen on board and defeat them. The convicts are admittedly an unsavory lot . . . murderers, Army deserters and pickpockets. Matrac is a journalist who was railroaded to prison for his political convictions. All of them love France and hate the Nazis.

Even after they dispose of Duval, the battle isn't over. The Fascist wireless operator has radioed their position to a German bomber. So the fight goes on—but you must see its exciting finish for yourself.

TRUSHAY* ...THE "BEFOREHAND" LOTION

Guards lovely, busy hands
Use it before every soap-and-water chore

JUST smooth on this creamy, fragrant lotion beforehand—before you do dishes, or wash undies. Trushay guards soft hands against the roughening, drying effects of hot, soapy water —instead of waiting until after damage is done.

Use Trushay all the other ways you'd use a lotion, too. As a smooth powder base, or for velvety, all-over body rubs. It's inexpensive. So concentrated a few drops do the trick. Ask for Trushay at your druggist's.

---

*Trushay was formerly called Toushay. A slightly different spelling—but it's the same wonderful "beforehand" lotion.

That Bogart is really something!—War.

P. S.

Longest name on the payroll for this film (or any other, for that matter) was Feodor Karkovhonohostoffchovitz. Time office couldn't get his name on a check, paid him off in cash. . . . Bogart and Peter Lorre, who are great pals, spent their lunch hours wandering through local eateries, spoiling everyone's appetite with their weird appearance—beards mudmatted, eyes bloodshot, faces generally grimy and gruesome-looking. . . . All the members of the "Ville de Nancy" crew were experienced stunt men, instead of extras. Producer Hal Wallis felt they could take better care of themselves during the violent action. . . . The Senegalese troops, 324 Negroes recruited from Central Avenue, were trained in military formations by Sylvain Robert, a former commander of Spahis in North Africa.

ARE THESE OUR CHILDREN?

Growing up is a tough process. Parents can help, if they're the right kind. The wrong kind just make things tougher. There are both kinds in this picture. There is tragedy which comes of teen age girls and boys hurled along too fast by the rush of war. One of the boys—a typical one, perhaps—is Frankie (Glenn Vernon). Frankie is tired of "wasting time" in school. He wants to get out and be a welder or do something important. Besides, he wants money to spend on the girl next door, Sarah Taylor (Tessa Brind).

Frankie's parents don't like the Taylor family, who are new in the neighborhood. The Taylors work in a war plant, leaving Sarah home to care for her two younger sisters. And at night Sarah has to stay home, too, while her father and mother "go out on the town." It's not much of a life for Sarah. She loves Frankie, but she hardly ever gets a chance to see him. The night of her birthday she slips out to meet him, and that's when trouble steps up. Frankie has gone away, and Sarah meets Larry Duncan (Lawrence Tierney), who is older and has money to spend. He persuades her to go with him and Toddy (Bonita Granville) to a roadhouse. Toddy is a tough little neighborhood girl, and she isn't too pleased to have Sarah along, particularly since Larry is obviously attracted to her.

Frankie hears that Sarah has been seen with Larry. "I've got to get some real dough," he says savagely. "I'll show that Larry!" The way to fast money, he hears, is through stolen tires. Frankie agrees to try a "little job" along that line. The result—for him, for Sarah, for Toddy and Larry—is tragedy. It's one of those sorry messes that pile up so quickly from a single misstep.

Kent Smith as Dannie, a wounded soldier who tries to help the neighborhood kids, is a figure of quiet irony. Bonita Granville is appallingly real as Toddy. Glenn Vernon, Tesse Brind and half a dozen others turn in accurate portrayals of youth in a jam. We can all learn a lesson from "Are These Our Children?" and we'd better learn it fast.—RKO.

P. S.

Bonita is now a full-fledged star, complete with seven-year contract and a dressing room of her own. Became 21 in February, incidentally. Used to be in sixth place as far as the number of letters was concerned, but now she's in second place, topped only by Ginger Rogers, Queen of the RKO lot. . . . Debuting in this is Tessa

BROADWAY RHYTHM

Step up to anybody from Timbuktu to Teheran and say, "What's the most famous street in the world?" You'll get just one answer—"Broadway." It's the street of glamour and music and heartbreak. It's the street of stars on the way out and others on the way in—of success that's soon forgotten and failure that turns into success overnight. It's the street of people like the Demming family. . . .

Jonnie Demming is a song and dance man—a successful one. He is played by George Murphy, which is a good thing, because George is one guy who really looks and acts like the Jonnies of Broadway. Jonnie, with a record of three successful shows behind him, is producing another. His father, Sam Demming (Charles Winninger), gets a wistful look in his eye every time the show is mentioned. He'd love to be in it. "You're retired!" says Jonnie firmly. His kid sister Patsy (Gloria DeHaven) gives Jonnie the same sort of trouble. She's sure there ought to be a spot for her in the show, but he unsympathetically sends her back to school and mutters, "What a family!"

A visiting star from Hollywood, Helen Hoyt (Ginny Simms), has been suggested as the lead, but Jonnie says no, he wants a Latin type. So Helen comes around in a black wig and a mantilla, trailing a couple of duennas, and he goes for it and offers her the part. But by then Helen has changed her mind and refuses it, to Jonnie's baffled fury. Especially since he has promptly fallen in love with her.

Meantime his dad has unearthed a play from an old trunk of Jonnie's, and he and Patsy are going to produce it in a barn up in the country. Helen hears about it and not only backs them financially but agrees to play the lead herself. They hire Lena Horne and Hazel Scott, and their manager, Rochester, who doubles in brass as a chauffeur and valet, and they're all set. Just then Jonnie finds out what's going on, and the sparks start to fly—in Technicolor. In fact, the whole thing's Technicolor. And very pretty, too.—M-G-M.

P. S.

Ginny took a short vacation from "Broadway Rhythm" to make her first personal appearance in San Francisco since she sang there years ago in night clubs. This time she sang with the Symphony Orchestra. . . . George Murphy became a papa for the second time when Melissa Elaine was born while picture was in production. . . . Johnny Green was married to Bunny Waters just before the completion of the picture. Cast wasn't lucky enough to see the ceremony, but Johnny and Bunny brought back great hunks of gooey wedding cake for all to share.

FOUR JILLS IN A JEEP

Martha Raye is talking to a general. "General," she says impressively, "I sure wish I was a man! I'd be right over there in the thick of the fight!" "Really?" says the General politely. "Yes, sir!" says Martha, beginning to believe it herself. "If they'd just send me over there as an entertainer of something, I'd be the happiest girl in the world!" "Me, too," chorus Kay Francis, and Carole Landis and Mitzi Mayfair. After all, it doesn't do any harm to say those things, and they want the General to go away happy. "Girls," says the General, "it's a wonderful idea. Be ready to start next week!" That noise you hear is the girls falling in a faint on the floor.

Anyway, that's how it happens in the picture. The girls are sent to England where they get the greeting of their life from the troops. They put on shows in all the camps, big and little, and between shows they do their laundry and pour pails of water over each other in lieu of showers and are adopted by a sergeant named Eddie (Phil Silvers). Eddie takes them everywhere in his jeep. "It's a wonderful car," he says, taking four bumps in a row without slowing down once. "Paid for, too." "Now I know how a chocolate milk shake feels," mourns Martha, holding her head.

While they're in England, Carole falls in love. The man is a handsome Air Force captain named Ted (John Harvey). Mitzi is in love, too, with a soldier, Dick (Dick Haymes), who used to do a vaudeville act with her. Carole and Ted get married, but before they can have a honeymoon, Martha meets another general, and the girls are off for Africa.

Africa is full of sand and camels—and Nazis. Life isn't very funny in Africa. Death is too close. The girls help the nurses in the hospital, and duck into fox holes when the bombers come over. And they give shows to the boys who are going into battle tomorrow. The kind of shows that for a short, enchanted hour make them think they're back home. For the soldier's dough, the four jills are tops.

So is the picture. Martha Raye has never been funnier. You'll like the jills and their jeep.—20th-Fox.

P. S.

Girls had sworn that the first thing they would order when back in the good old U. S. was ice cream, so they headed for the café at the edge of the flying field and said, "make ours vanilla." The waitress who hadn't had ice cream to serve for two weeks, asked them if they didn't know there was a war going on. . . . Wedding dress Carole wears in the picture is an exact duplicate of the gown she wore when married to Capt. Tom Wallace in England. . . . Altogether Carole figures she has traveled over 165,000 miles entertaining troops since the war began. . . . Martha and Carole returned to England after doing their shows in North Africa. Carole wanted to see her groom, and Martha needed time to recuperate from an attack of malaria. When Martha had regained a few of her lost 22 pounds, the gals did a few more shows in Great Britain before flying back to the states.

I SAW IT HAPPEN

Last April when we attended a junior press conference for Frank Sinatra, my editor and I expected a real glamour guy—and a stuffy studio interview. Instead we found a young fellow in sport clothes surrounded by a crowd of kids. He answered nearly every question we asked him, and before long we found ourselves laughing and talking to him just as though he were the fellow next door. That's the real Frank Sinatra—a very regular guy.

BUFFALO BILL

There are a few almost legendary figures in American history whose very names are exciting. One of them is Buffalo Bill Cody. Twentieth-Century-Fox has made a spectacular Technicolor production of Buffalo Bill's life. Joel McCrea is a "natural" for the role of the tall, shy woodsman who is the friend of both Indians and whites. Maureen O'Hara is properly gay and lovely as the Eastern girl who falls in love with him. Linda Darnell plays the Indian beauty, Dawn Starlight, and is probably the best looking squaw since Pocahontas.

The story opens when Louisa Frederici (Maureen O'Hara) and her father, the Senator, come West. They are assured that its perfectly safe, but nevertheless their stagecoach is greeted by Indian arrows. Fortunately Buffalo Bill happens along to rescue them. One smile from Louisa, and its Bill that needs rescuing. Dawn Starlight would be glad to break up the romance, but it just can't be done. Even the Senator is helpless.

An Indian uprising occurs as a result of the seizure of lands belonging to the Cheyenne tribe. A New York financier wants to build a railroad across there, so the Indians are to be thrown out, in spite of Buffalo Bill's protests. In the course of the bloody battle that follows, the Senator is seized as a hostage. Louisa is desperate, and Bill risks his own life to rescue her father. After that, the Senator can't very well oppose the marriage.

Bill and Louisa have four happy years together in their primitive surroundings, until the birth of their son. But at that time trouble again stalks on moccasined feet through the valleys—the Indians are on the war path once more. Bill goes off to fight, and Louisa, wanting to save their son from this kind of life, goes back East with the child. Tragedy faces them for a while, but with the help of the writer, Ned Buntling (Thomas Mitchell), Bill at last comes into his own.—20th-Fox.

P. S.

Joel McCrea left for his overseas jaunt the minute production halted. . . . Returned safely and asked to be sent right out again. . . . His wife, Frances Dee, is touring Army and Navy stations throughout the country. . . . Maureen O'Hara spent every spare minute of her time between scenes writing to husband Lt. Will Price of the United States Marine Corps. He is stationed at Quantico, Va., could get only one short leave to spend with her. They'll become parents soon. . . . This is Linda Darnell's first character role. Linda is one-eighth Cherokee Indian, herself and has been hoping for years to be assigned to an Indian characterization. Thomas Mitchell and Maureen banded together in a Society for Overcoming Fear of Horses. Both Mitchell and Miss O'Hara have had serious accidents while riding, and it was a real problem.

THE PURPLE HEART

Here is a picture that will make you so mad you can't see straight. No. Wait a minute. Maybe it will make you so mad you can see straight—straight through the complacency and smugness which still fog our all-out fighting spirit. "The Purple Heart" is the story of a trial by jury. The jury is Japanese, so are the lawyers and the judge. The defendants are eight American fliers who have bombed Tokyo. They are accused of murder. "According to Japanese law, they will be presumed guilty until proven innocent. "Don't bother, boys," Lt. Bayforth (Charles Russell) tells the others as they protest. "This is a lynching." And in a cruel, formal torturing way, that's exactly what it is.

The fliers are an oddly assorted group. Their leader, Captain Ross (Dana Andrews), is a lean, calm Texan. Lt. Vincent (Donald Barry) is a tough Irishman. Sergeant Greenbaum (Sam Levene) is the philosophical, humorous type, who tries to look after Clinton (Farley Granger), the baby of the group. They are all united in one steely determination not to reveal a single detail which could harm America. Not for food or relief from pain or for life itself.

The entire picture is founded on the Japs' struggle to break that resolve. To break it by torture or trickery, but to break it. One by one the fliers are taken away from their companions and subjected to an ordeal calculated to drive them past the limits of human endurance. But endurance, backed by an iron will, can stretch to incredible lengths. Eventually, of course, something snaps. Sanity, perhaps. But by then it is too late for the torturers to get the information they want.

This story of a mock trial isn't pleasant. But it is effective, inspiring drama and the sort of enemy we're up against and the courage we need to defeat him. The whole cast is good, with Sam Levene and John Craven and Farley Granger especially convincing.—20th-Fox.

P. S.

Director Lewis ("All Quiet on the Western Front") Milestone knows exactly what he wants in these stories of men in war, their hopes, fears, loves, reactions to danger. . . . Dana Andrews and Milestone are the best of friends, held many a long discussion after working hours about the part Dana plays . . . Donald Barry, who plays Lt. Peter Vincent, is the same "Red" Barry who stars in Westerns for Republic. "Red" is also a prolific story-writer, has sold several scripts to RKO and other studios. . . . Farley Granger is the boy Sam Goldwyn discovered by advertising in the local paper when he was looking for a second lead to Dana in "North Star."

over?' I asked our family doctor about it, and he said that hundreds more have gone across in just the last few weeks, thanks to the U.S.C.N.C. Seems every two gals that enlist in the Nurse Corps free a full-fledged R.N. for front-line service. That, then, is definitely for me. Tell me all."

We'll begin at the beginning. Immediately after Pearl Harbor, the Army and Navy began recruiting graduate nurses like mad for overseas service. They went, thousands of them; braving the terror of the U-boat infested North Atlantic and Jap-infested Pacific. In huge over-crowded transports, they went, in Flying Fortresses, in small, uncomfortable cargo ships. To Bataan, Guam, Sicily, New Guinea, North Africa. To the enormous floating hospitals that brought home the wounded.

At home, civilian hospitals became dangerously under-staffed, and civilian health was beginning to suffer. Slim, tired girls were working long hours. A handful of nurses were left in a hospital that had once considered a staff of 50 essential. Something had to be done to relieve these over-burdened women and to keep the stream of nurses flowing into the ever-widening battle areas. There was an enormous drive to recruit more nurses. Thousands responded, but there still weren't half enough. So in June, 1943, the U.S.C.N.C. was founded by an Act of Congress, its purpose being to give a complete nursing education to every girl and woman in the United States who could qualify.

life-savers . . .

Hundreds of the first gals to enlist in it are already a third of the way through their training, and because of them, there were enough nurses available to the Army to care for the terrible casualties of Cassino. Enough to staff the hospital ships that brought boys home from the fighting in the South Pacific.

"It makes me feel kind of wonderful," a pre-Cadet told us yesterday, "to know that if it weren't for me, some graduate would still be doing my job, instead of patching up a Yank somewhere. I've never done anything very important before, and gosh, here I am saving guys' lives. Isn't that terrific?"

That then, is why the U.S.C.N.C. was created, and here is what your enlistment in it will give you. Full tuition in an accredited nursing school of your own choice, the course taking between 24 and 30 months. Your room, board and uniforms, indoors and out. (And these, incidentally, are knockout.) A monthly allowance of $15 during the first nine months of training. Twenty dollars a month for the next 15 to 21 months. Thirty dollars for the remaining time. In addition, upon graduation, you're assured of a job and a good one in war or peace.

Maybe you're asking what's the catch. You old cynic you, there is none. The situation is just like we say. Better even. All races and creeds are acceptable to the U.S.C.N.C. Marriage is no barrier to enlistment. And even if the war ends before you complete your course, you are eligible to go on with it, if you've been in for 90 days. Naturally, upon graduation, you are expected to go into some essential nursing field, though not necessarily with the Armed forces.

Now, do you qualify? You do if you're between the ages of 17 and 35; in good health; a graduate of an accredited high.

Now, which school, and what goes on once you're in. There are as many different types of nursing schools as there are dif-quite snooty ones and some terribly stiff ones. There are some in the country with all kinds of athletic facilities (swimming pools, tennis courts, etc.). Some in the city with access to plays, lectures and concerts.

Make up your mind which environment you're happiest in before deciding on a school. Consider, too, the educational program it offers—pediatrics, psychiatry, obstetrics, surgery. If you're interested in being either an Army or Navy nurse, be sure the school you choose is connected with a hospital having a daily average of 100 patients. That's a basic military requirement. And just in case you didn't know, you can enlist in the Army or Navy Nurse Corps even come Victory, at a base salary ranging from $1,800 to $4,000 a year. Additional note: It's now possible for nurses in executive and supervisory positions in public health centers, hospitals and nursing schools, to earn up to $6,000 or $7,000 a year. Which ain't peanuts.

As for what goes on in a nursing school—lots. And while much of it's work, there's a hunk of fun thrown in. Like the Saturday night dances and the bull sessions when you're through cramming for an anatomy quiz.

You'll live in a nurses' residence, which in addition to bedrooms, will have a nice living room. It may also have a kitchen, a laundry for general use and a library.

During your first nine months, you'll see demonstrations of nursing technique, including supervised work in hospital wards, classroom and laboratory. As a Junior, you'll spend less time in class, more time in operating rooms and in out-patient departments. You'll be taking care of patients, helping the doctors and meeting emergencies head-on. As a Senior cadet, you will assume, under supervision, the duties and responsibilities of a graduate nurse. When you graduate, you're called a cadet nurse, and you may become a registered nurse by passing a state exam.

That's the story, and if it sounds good to you, write immediately—this very instant—to us: Cadet Nurse Corps, MODERN SCREEN, 149 Madison Ave., New York 16, N. Y., for a list of accredited nursing schools and for any additional information.

Frankly, we love gossip. We think these true experiences with Hollywood people are bright spots in the magazine. And, too, we think that perhaps you ought to be rewarded a little more generously for them. So, instead of sending you $1 for your letter if we use it, we're going to mail you $5.00, beginning next month. Of course we reserve the right to edit and revise your letters and will return them to you only when a self-addressed, stamped envelope is enclosed. Do write us. 10,086 women took the time to write frank, intimate letters telling why they're glad they switched to Modess! They were women of all ages—in every kind of job you can imagine. Women who'd used other kinds of napkins (almost every brand and type.) But they'd switched to Modess—they said they were glad of it—and 8 out of 10 gave its wonderful softness, its comfort, or its dependable safety as their reasons! Now remember . . .

These "8 out of 10" included teen-agers, young marrieds, mothers. But typical of their opinions is this letter of Mrs. E. J. S. "Modess stays soft and absorbent much longer and that's important when I spend long hours taking that soldier's place on the farm." Modess is made with a special softspun filler—not close-packed layers! (No hard tab ends. No telltale outlines.) Its triple, full-length shield at the back gives full-way protection, not just part-way, as some napkins give. Why not try softer, safer Modess yourself?

"Lost your last friend?" Mommy asked my nineteen-year-old Cousin Kate. "Not my last friend, just my best beau," Kate sobbed. "He's too interested in another girl. I've lost him, I know!" "He's not lost yet, darling," Mommy comforted. "My dimpled dumpling (that's me) has a beauty secret that may bring your lieutenant back into camp."

"Some velvety cheek—eh?" Mommy chuckled, pinching mine. "Switch to regular cleansings with pure, mild Ivory and I'm sure your complexion will grow clearer and lovelier. More doctors advise Ivory than all other brands together. It has no coloring, medication or strong perfume that might be irritating."

"Ooooooh—look at them! That's Kate with Tom—and they were married at our house! See how happy—and pretty—she looks. As a matter of fact, right after she started those regular, gentle cleansings with 'Velvet-suds' Ivory Soap her complexion began to bloom like a dewy rose. And Tom forgot the other girl! TO OUR READERS...

We are just recovering from a bad case of false modesty!

It's almost a year since we began publishing our OVERSEAS EDITION FOR THE ARMED FORCES . . . a bright magazine with the best pin-ups and the best stories from both MODERN SCREEN and SCREEN ROMANCES. In Algiers, Naples and Bombay, American boys are keeping up with pictures and picture folk with our help. And all this time we've sort of taken it for granted.

Somehow we never felt too puffed up about it. One gold star on a service flag makes any civilian contribution small. A single American boy dead on the field of battle outweighs all the magazines ever published.

That's tough talk, but it gives you an idea why we never felt like saying much about our Overseas Edition. We kind of figured we were like a guy who shipped out dehydrated eggs—maybe a little less important, because you can't eat magazines.

That's where we were wrong. From all corners of this battered globe the good word keeps coming: "We love the damn book. We eat it up!"

That's a gorgeous tribute! We think we understand what it means. It means that MODERN SCREEN'S simple, true pictures of typical American families bring to the dead ends of the world a vital seed of home. Maybe the seed is small. But if it can grow strong and alive in a soldier's heart, we think we're doing a pretty good work.

EXECUTIVE EDITOR

DONALD O'CONNOR

His crib was a scarred suitcase propped on a dressing room wall, his lullaby the brassy slur of a slide trombone. Part 1, life story.

One afternoon five years ago a skinny kid of 13 sat on a chair in the wardrobe department at Paramount studios and tried to stuff his feet into a pair of shoes that were obviously too small. He twisted and pushed and perspired, but he couldn't make it. The wardrobe man watched him with a half-amused, half-sorry smile. Another man came in the door, stood and watched, too.

"Having trouble?" the new man asked.

The kid grinned apologetically. "They're kinda tight."

"How's the rest?" The new man was talking to the wardrobe fellow now.

"Pants are two inches too short and the coat sleeves the same. That shirt looks like a joke on him. "Mr. Ruggles," protested the wardrobe man, "the truth is, this wardrobe just isn't big enough for Donald. I think—"

Wesley Ruggles, preparing to direct a picture, broke in. "Don," he said, "when you get dressed come into my office, will you?"

Behind closed doors, Ruggles, a veteran Hollywood director, did what he hated to do. He explained to Donald O'Connor why he would have to take him out of the picture he was about to shoot, "Invitation to Happiness," with Fred MacMurray and Irene Dunne. Don's part was the small son of Irene, and he'd shot up so in size in the past months that he was just too big. Ruggles' eyes (Continued on following page) were suspiciously moist as he told Don O'Connor the blunt truth that afternoon. "You've come into that awkward age, Don," he said. "It's tough on kid stars. Some can hold on but not many. Here's the straight dope: There just aren't any parts around here for you any more."

When Donald O'Connor's option came up in a few days, the front office told him the bad news: It wasn't going to be renewed. What they were telling him really was that he was through in Hollywood. Through at 13!

Don O'Connor had made 11 pictures and had his named billed with Hollywood greats like Bing Crosby and Gary Cooper, Ray Milland, Betty Grable and a dozen more. He had even been starred in a couple, "Tom Sawyer, Detective" and "Sons of the Legion." He'd made hits on the screen, ever since he played Small Fry with Bing Crosby in "Sing You Sinners." His salary was $900 a week. He had fan mail flowing in and stories in the magazines about him, pictures in the papers. And now something as normal as breathing, something he couldn't help kicked him out of all this—just plain growing up.

Don and Potsy used to play backstage between acts. Don always wore diamond rings for luck, often had to go to bat to keep 'em from hoodlums!

At 12, had first featured role in "Sing You Sinners" playing kid brother to Fred MacMurray and Bing Crosby. Role fit like an old shoe; routine was same he'd gone thru with his own brothers. Scored solid hit singing "Small Fry."

A ladies' man from way back, Don can't even remember first date but recalls that first kiss was planted on Boston chorus girl.

After H'wood stretch, returned to family's act, appeared in World's Fair Irish Village. In '41 Univ. rediscovered him.

Up until he was 11, he'd never had time for regular schooling. Even with work, he's maintaining above-average grades under tutelage of L. A. high school teacher. Also took navigation course for future role in the war.

Don, currently in "Chip Off the Old Block," says when he's in role, he lives character he's portraying at home as well as studio!

"What's Cookin'?" with Gloria Jean and Peggy Ryan started onslaught of fan mail boosting him to stardom.

Says most embarrassing moment was when he took Gloria Jean to movies and forgot the money. Had to borrow from her dad. Worse still, studio publicity department spread the story around.

He and Peggy Ryan will be 20 this August; birthdays are two days apart.

Irish chin when they told him the bad news. "So we're closing the run," he said. He was a show business kid from the word "go," and he'd been in spots like this before. "So what? I'll play this circuit again!"

It was a bold boast. Not one in a hundred kids leaves Hollywood, as Donald O'Connor did, and comes back to set it on its ears. Usually they vanish into the limbo of forgotten child stars. Unless they stay runty like Mickey Rooney, or grow up quick like Deanna Durbin, they've got two strikes on them and a fast curve ball coming their way.

But Donald O'Connor has made good his cocky boast. At 18, Small Fry O'Connor was back in Hollywood as Mister Big—from the Universal picture of the same name.

What made that a hit and all the O'Connor hits before it was—Donald O'Connor. And what brought him back again as the biggest new juvenile star of Hollywood's year was the same buzzing, bright and fascinating little guy, simply spilling over with personality and talent. That's all there is to it. The public discovered Don O'Connor again. Universal, an up-and-coming young-minded studio, can take a bow for handing Don a second chance. But Don really pushed his program pictures across to the Hit column. Now he's the hottest thing on the Universal lot, and only postage stamp rationing can stop the 7000 letters that swamp him every week.

They're calling him a new Mickey Rooney out in Hollywood, and a lot of people think that Don O'Connor has as much on the ball as Mickey the Great ever had. If "This is the Life," "Top Man" and "Chip Off the Old Block" don't boost Donald O'Connor into the top ten box-office honor roll this year—then a lot of movie prophets will have to swallow their long grey beards.

So he's done it—has Donald O'Connor—what has never been done in Hollywood before: Been a star once. . . . Left Hollywood cold to grow up. . . . Made a comeback—bigger, better and brighter than before. And made chumps of the wise ones who cracked, "It can't happen here!"

But, looking back, it's hard to see how Donald O'Connor could have missed this bright destiny. From the day he was born he has been (Continued on page 96)

Even in the Best of Families . . .

Things do happen. Nothing to send Janie fluttering home in tears to Mother, but still . . .

By Ida Zeitlin

Ronnie's mom, dishing doughnuts at H'wood Canteen heard G.I. say aim of his life was to buy Jane a drink. Mrs. R. phoned Jane, who scooted down to oblige.

Things have been happening to Captain Ronald Reagan's women.

Button-nose Senior—Jane Wyman to Warner Brothers—has burst into stardom.

Button-nose Junior has slipped out of babyhood. She's no longer Murmur, nor even Mau-ween, but an independent 3-year-old who can lick her weight in Rs. "I'm Mau-rrreen Rrreagan," she says and looks as if she dared you to contradict her.

As for Ronnie, the Army's got him, body and soul. For him the movies have ceased to exist. Jane tells him about something that's happened at the studio. He listens quietly—too quietly—

"You don't hear a word I say, do you, Ronnie?"

"Hmm? Gee, I'm sorry, hon." (Continued on page 79)

After Ronnie left Jane and H'wood for Army, his fan mail swelled to second place on Warner lot. Errol Flynn, 1st in hearts of mash-note-writers, beat him by couple of stocks.

Capt. Reagan's wife can lure Canteen with "St. Louis Woman," in 5 languages. G.I.'s say she's terrific.

Janie rapidly tumbled from hairdressing to switchboard operating, office work, modeling, scratch singing, writing (recently had two stories published).

Reagans get mildly hysterical every time they think of their "hammy" child sweetly kissing photographer at Danny Milland's birthday party. (Mom's next, "One More Tomorrow.")

After making and breaking first date, Ellie asked Glenn to house for dinner, saw eye to eye on roast-beef-mashed-potato-ice-cream routine. Discovered like tastes in music, books.

For Always

Night Ellie and Glenn wound up at Florentine Gardens after her trousseau shopping, they found Eng. soldiers swamping place. After orchestra had packed up instruments for the night, each of 'em twirled Ellie 'round once, to piano player's tunes.

By Abigail Putnam

Sometimes it's a smile or a sweet, quick glance that says what you can't put into words. To Glenn and Ellie it's a tune . . .

They knew they'd be married in 1943. But not till a week before, did they know it would be on October 23rd.

Ever since he joined the Marine Corps, Glenn had been saving days. "I won't ask for anything now, sir," he'd say when the question of leave came up. "Because I would like to have ten days when I get married."

The minute he came in from Camp Pendleton that week-end, Ellie knew something was up. In moments of excitement, Glenn can be very calm and collected—only his eyes give him away. They look as if a small bonfire had been lighted behind them.

"Doing anything special next Saturday?" he asked. "Because if you're not, I have a furlough, and I'd like to get married."

* * *

The stars represent an interlude that has nothing to do with us. When we see them next, Ellie's eyes are on fire, too, but they've both reached the stage where plans can be discussed.

The first plan was to be married at Santa Barbara—with no witnesses but Ellie's mother and Glenn's. There was so little time for preparations, it seemed the sensible thing to do. But sitting there in front of the fire, Ellie's heart cried out against the sensible thing—

She turned to Glenn. "I've always wanted a wedding to think back on. I've always wanted to be married in a white dress—"

"Me, too," he smiled. "And if you think you could manage it in a week, I'll manage dress blues."

That was all she needed, if she needed anything—the vision of Glenn in dress blues. On Monday morning she was at Magnin's, where she always shops. If you think her best talent lies in her dancing feet, you're wrong. It lies in her talent for human relationships. Magnin's isn't just the place where she shops. It's the place where the girl behind the bag counter waves hello as Ellie passes, and Ellie knows exactly how long it is since the elevator girl last heard from her husband somewhere in the South Pacific. (Continued on page 116)

Cues for Ellie's coming "Sensations of 1944" are so befuddling, she and electrician rehearse together 4 hrs. a day. She's turned down $7500 a wk. P.A. tour, to be near Glenn.

Glenn (who's won sharpshooting medal) used to rout the Powells out of bed with 5 A.M. phone calls. Three minutes later, Ellie'd start letter. Wrote two a day. (Above, Glenn with Bill Lundigan and Marine Raiders' Colonel Evans Carlson.)

There's a clause in Lon McCallister's contracts that says nothing can be printed about him that's not the truth.

HERE HE COMES!

By Nancy Winslow Squire

Swoon Boy of 1944 kicked up a racket with improvised words and music 5:50 A.M., Jan. 11, when he arrived weighing 8 lbs., 12 ounces.

By Jean Kinkead

It's a Boy!

Three lovelier words he never heard—poor frazzled Frankie, pacing the floor a continent away. And now Pop's singing a lullaby in blue.

Nancy Sandra was just about two days old when Frank began talking more babies. "What's one kid?" he said. "Nothing. It's pathetic. You need five or six before you're a family." Frankie had been an only child, lonely as the dickens. Nancy had been one of seven, constantly stalking a bit of privacy and solitude.

"One kid's all right," she said softly, from her throne of pillows. "One kid's kind of wonderful."

Frankie squeezed her hand and looked deep in her eyes. "Yeah, it is, isn't it?" he said, feeling all gooshy for a minute; then added doggedly, "For a starter."

Nancy was right, it so happened. One kid was wonderful. Maybe she did tie you down a little. And maybe she did knock hell out of your best clothes via tiny white-shod feet. She was still terrific, and for a long while she was all he wanted. Nancy, soft and lovable, impish and (Continued on following page)

After breakfast, 3 Sinatras huddle over Mother Goose few minutes, then Frank dashes. Once, when Nancy Sandra was en route Frank's bookings got mixed and he and Nancy ate onion sandwiches 2 days.

Frank, who's proved he can lick his weight in hecklers, says, "Sure, I'm skimpy, but I'll take on any 3 guys at once." Always wears identification tag given him by Mauriello, with ditto's name on inscription.

When Frank leaves, Mrs. S. tears into household chores, has never had maid more than 2 days a week. With 10-room set-up comes playroom, gym, practice golf range, archery.

noisy. Nancy, pink-cheeked and laughing in the daytime; all scrubbed and shiny in the evening. She was enough.

Then suddenly she graduated from overalls to pinafores, and one day Frankie came home to find her with pink on her nails and her hair up in a pompadour.

"Look, Mom," he told Mrs. Sinatra at dinner that night. "That babe's practically grown-up. I wish we had a nice tiny new job around."

"That," said Nancy smugly, "is what I've been trying to tell you ever since you got in, only you got so involved with your daughter . . ."

"What do you mean?" Frankie flew over to her side of the table. "What do you mean?"

"The new baby, dope. It's all set for December."

"It is? Oh gosh. Oh gee, that's wonderful. Are you okay, Mom? I'm gonna call the boys right away and let them know." Frank was like a wild man.

"Butch, sit down and finish your dinner. And for the love of Mike, don't go telling everyone already." Frank didn't answer. He was too busy thinking how he'd spring the news on people. By the next day, everyone knew. Including Dotty Kilgallen and Louella Parsons. Including Nancy Sandra.

want for Christmas?" is how Frankie led up to it.

"A train—a doll—a doll carriage—a dog—and a tricycle," she rattled off without a moment's hesitation. The promptness of the comeback sort of threw her mom and pop, considering it was only May.

"How about a brother?" Frank prodded. "Would you like a baby brother?"

"Sure," she said. "I told Mom that already. A train—a doll—a doll carriage—a dog—a tricycle—and a brother with blond curls."

"Okay, honey. I'll tell Santa Claus right away, so's there won't be any hitch."

There now, there wasn't anybody left to tell. Frank sat back in his chair and eyed Mom dotingly. Life was indeed good. He doted on her all through the summer. Everytime she looked around, there was Frank with a glass of ice water or an electric fan or both.

"Relax," she'd tell him. "I'm perfectly all right, honey. I'm not even warm." He ignored that and pushed a chair under her—just in case.

"Haven't you any whims, Mom?" he'd ask her. "All expectant mothers have whims."

"Not a whim, Frank. Not even one." He'd bring her pickles anyway, and spiced ham and candy, just in case. And she ate all of it, which pleased him.

The first of December, Frank left for a Boston booking, positive that the minute he got out of town his son would arrive. (He'd been calling it "my son" from the very beginning.) He'd hang on the phone with Nancy by the hour. "As I see it, Mom, he should appear on my birthday at the latest." That was the 12th.

"The doctor says around the twentieth, honey," Nancy soothed him. "You'll be home by then."

"Yeah, but Nancy came so darned early, he probably will, too." (Nancy had been born two weeks ahead of schedule, on June 8, 1940, while Frank had turned his back for a couple of hours for a rehearsal with Tommy Dorsey's band.) "I give him till the twelfth."

No brothers around to heckle Shirley about her "men," nobody to whistle "whew" at her new dress!

Shirley calls them her Army and Marine brothers. They're so different, she doesn't know how they ever managed to get into the same family. But she's certainly glad they both got into hers.

Imagine if she'd had sisters instead, all the fun she'd have missed. Not that she'd have minded a little sister, that would have been nice. But an older one? Goodness, no! Older sisters act bossy. So do older brothers sometimes, but in sort of a nice way. They don't get all steamed up about it.

Jack was 14 when Shirley appeared on the scene, George was 10. So they never really played around together, like kids nearer the same age. A lot of the time they weren't even home. By the time she was old enough to kind of look around and take notice, George was going to military school in New Mexico,and Marion was an angel; Betty a hellion who danced and screamed and sang—and hoped someone was watching.

Betty and Marion had relatives in Battle Creek who used to send them things for Christmas. One Christmas they both asked for roller skates. When the package came, Betty—who could never wait—got her hands on it first and went tearing through it. There were roller skates for Marion, none for her. Her face went white, but she didn't say a word. Which only served to twist the knife a little deeper into her mother's heart.

Mabel Hutton's heart was used to aching over her little black sheep, who thought the way to break down a wall was to butt her head against it. Fiercely protective, she'd hunt for words to console Betty. Marion was two years older. But this time the stock arguments turned her stomach. What kind of stuff was that to hand out to a grieving kid at Christmas. (Continued on page 76)

Weak-kneed over scene with DeMille in early pic, Betty covered jitters by grabbing him, screaming, "Get in and pitch a great scene, C.B. We're for you."

Betty, who squanders everything but time, takes showers instead of baths to save minutes. Gobbles egg sandwich, milk before bed. Right, Red Skelton.

Betty chucks fuzzy brown teddybear on pillow beside her each night 'cause when she was a kid she never had one. For same reason, melts at sight of doll with real hair. (Above, with Mrs. Hutton, Betty 4, Marion 6.)

Marian Hutton (former Glenn Miller vocalist) is proud as an old biddy over (1) son Johnny, who's beginning to stand on own two chubby legs, (2) Mom, who's debuting as extra in Betty's "Incendiary Blonde."

Hollywood Canteen warriors swear Betty's only gal alive who can out-rumba and out-Lindy them. Leaves 'em frazzled. (Above, Al Dexter, father of "Pistol Packing Mama.")

Betty (currently in "Miracle of Morgan's Creek") added new gag to Hope repertoire. Told him of paratrooper who asked her to autograph his arm, then screamed, "This arm's not gonna get washed for the duration."

1. Liza Elliott (Ginger Rogers), fabulously successful editor of "Allure," finds herself suddenly haunted by fears, inexplicable dreams, asks Dr. Brooks (Barry Sullivan) for help.

2. Publisher Kendall Nesbitt (Warner Baxter), who's loved Liza always, tells her his wife is finally coming thru with divorce. When can they marry? Liza's too tired, bewildered to think.

3. Tearing back to doctor's office, Liza pours out dreams, bits remembered from childhood; how it ached to be so plain when her mother was so beautiful, how disappointed mother was.

4. Casual, brilliant Charley Johnson (Ray Milland) works under Liza, keeps jabbing mercilessly about the barren, loveless life of successful "Boss Lady." Liza hates him.

5. From dreams and remembered fragments Dr. Brooks learns that Liza once lost high school beau to prettier girl, has since stifled her own charm and beauty, afraid to be hurt by men.

6. A breathlessly lovely Liza turns out for date with Randy Curtis (Jon Hall), meets Charley with actress who sets to work on Randy. Liza abruptly leaves.

"Lady in the Dark"

To Ginger, brilliant, secure, fantastically successful, life's a headache. And, it turns out, Ray's the Bromo.

7. Randy would have proposed that night. Kendall has. Reality merges with dreams in which Liza has to make up her mind. Randy . . . Kendall . . . which?

. Dr. Brooks tells Liza what she needs is a stronger, surer on than either Ken or Randy. Later Charley announces he's uitting. Liza, to keep him, practically hands over her job.

9. Charley? Could it possibly be self-assured, razor-edged Charley? And could he possibly be looking at her as though she weren't just office equipment as though she were a woman?

STORY—She was frightened.

That never happened; it might happen to other people, the little, worried people who were clerks and stenographers. But not to Liza Elliott. Not brilliant Liza Elliott, editor of the smartest magazine for women in America; not Liza Elliott who thought of, created, pushed and scrabbled until "Allure" was the cream of the whole fashion parade.

But she was frightened; there was no denying it. What was it Dr. Carlton had said? "It's not your health, Liza. You're fit and sound. It's something in your mind." He had wanted her to see another doctor, a Dr. Brooks—a psychoanalyst. She? Liza Elliott? What in the world did she need a psychoanalyst for? She was happy, wasn't she, secure in her job, successful? But why was she frightened?

The office door swung open a bit, and she jumped a bit nervously and then bit (Continued on page 71)

PRODUCTION—The technical experts assigned to "Lady in the Dark" read the script before production began, groaned and asked themselves why they hadn't chosen some simple profession like weaving baskets under water.

For the circus sequence, they had to construct a jury box that would bob and sway in time to the music, yet be strong enough to hold 15 clowns. The two circus rings, the focus of attention for much of the scene, had to make revolutions in exactly nine and six-tenths seconds. After the details essential to their correct timing were completed, the arc lights were turned on, and immediately the amount of power was reduced (a small item that had been overlooked). The rings slowed down to ten-second revolutions and spoiled everything. Auxiliary generators had to be borrowed, and practically all other filming on the lot had to cease 'til the electric lines could cope with the heavy load again! (Continued on page 89)

Canteen Kid

"You won't remember me," Bill wrote. But he was wrong. As long as Joan lives she'll remember.

One night Joan was serving coffee behind the Snack Bar at the Hollywood Canteen, when a boy came up.

"I don't believe it," he said.

Now lots of boys might have said the same thing, and she'd have recognized it as an invitation to some breezy give-and-take, and replied in the same spirit.

But this boy was handing it out straight. Sincerity was written all over his quiet face. "What don't you believe?" asked Joan.

"That I'm seeing you. Maybe that sounds silly, but here's what I mean. I got in a couple of days ago, and I was pretty thrilled, especially coming from overseas. Hollywood's something wonderful to us fellows, and I kept looking for something wonderful to happen, but (Continued on page 109)

The two joes who didn't come for sandwiches are engineer and radio man of 14th Air Force stationed in China. Joan learned insignia on backs were notice to Chinese they were friendly.

Discipline on set of "This Is the Army" was so rigid, G.I.s had to let a grin substitute for a "line." Military restrictions forbade their talking to Joan during work.

Around studio, "Rhapsody in Blue" has been redubbed "R. in Black and Blue" since dance routine pitched Joan downstairs with sprained ankle, assorted bruises.

Cooper troupe invading South Pacific! Lt. Eddie Albert with Coast Guard in Tarawa landing! Irene Dunne launches S.S. Carole Lombard!

BABY OF THE YEAR:

The J. Walter Thompson Company is an august business enterprise, ensconced in elegant offices behind dignified double doors. One afternoon in January, the Thompson Company eyebrows ascended as one arch; the Thompson Company was being mobbed. The invading army wore a uniform: saddle oxfords, bobby sox, pleated skirts and sloppy joes. The invading army spoke a language all its own, "Murder, he says!" "Roger and Wilco." "Who's beating her gums about what?" "Take a pleat in your tongue, your jaw is hanging."

Here and there appeared the obvious officers of this force: leggy characters wearing blue windbreakers on the back of which was the gold felt inscription, "I am a Sinatra Swooner."

Frank Sinatra, the Sultan of Swoon, was to inaugurate his series of broadcasts, and the B. Sox Brigade was stampeding for tickets. When the supply was exhausted, a small red sign was hung on the door, to wit: "No More Sinatra Tickets." Nonplused late-comers had to content themselves with writing bitter comments on this sign.

The line before the Lux Radio Theater began to form around 3 o'clock for the 6 o'clock broadcast. The conversation along the line dealt with prized Sinatra recordings and favorite Sinatra anecdotes. One favorite confidence, bandied about from one ardent group to the other, was that Frank was to caddy for Bing Crosby at a forthcoming charity match. The second most engrossing item was the advent of Frank's second child. One partisan summed up the group emotional condition neatly, "We've just been suffering like crazy with Frankie, waiting for that baby to get here."

Ten days later, Nancy and Frank became the parents of a boy, to be named Francis Wayne, (Continued on page 62)

BRASS BUTTONS:

The troupe consisting of Gary Cooper, Una Merkel, Phyllis Brooks, and Eddie Arcari, landed at an airport somewhere in the South Pacific and noted with interest the presence of great quantities of gold braid on smartly squared shoulders. Obviously, something dramatic was in the offing, but none of the welcoming committee vouchsafed an explanation to the entertainers. They just waited around. By and by a second plane landed, and from it descended General Marshall.

That afternoon the General addressed the troops briefly. Thereafter, Gary, Eddie and the girls put on their show, an entertainment which General Marshall remained to watch. "We were so excited we almost blew our lines," Una confessed afterward.

At the close of the show General Marshall met the four wanderers and explained in his modest way that he hoped they didn't mind his addressing soldiers who had really gathered hours early to hear the Cooper show. "I was just a fill-in," he grinned.

Gary looked at the sky and the earth for an answer. Then he grinned right back.

Days went by, and the incident was not discussed. Then one evening Gary suddenly observed, "Gosh! Some fill-in, huh?"

We have been snooping, in your behalf, through the fan mail of certain persons, and we come up triumphantly with the following:

"Our dear Miss Lamour:

"We, the commissioned members of the crew of the United States submarine Gudgeon, have taken it upon ourselves to send you our most cherished possession—not a Jap battle flag or the scalp of an enemy commander, but a picture! A picture placed within an unused gauge, many months before, in the engine room of our gallant vessel. A picture that has done wonders in seeing us through numerous engagements with the Nippers. It was looked upon for protection and comfort countless times during depth charge attacks—and comfort and protection was always found. It is a veteran of ten war patrols in enemy-controlled waters, scores of depth charges (hence the name "Depth Charge Dottie") and has witnessed extensive damage to our enemy.

"You became a veteran early in the war when, during an especially heavy attack, the glass covering your face was shattered, leaving an ugly scar across your cheek. Beyond that, excluding a little scotch tape and good old Gudgeon dirt, you look none the worse for thirty months of sea duty.

"And so, it is with kindest regards that we send you the enclosed picture and hope it will find its way to your scrapbook.

Most sincerely,
Ship's Company,
U.S.S. Gudgeon."

At tea party, Frankie gave rugged rendition of "Old Man River" for Admiral Halsey, who applauded wildly. Frank was honored till he learned he'd sung through dead mike. (With Ginger right.)

The picture went into Dottie's scrapbook, and a new and luscious portrait went to the ship's company of the gallant Gudgeon. Those of you who have seen "Destination Tokyo" know what sort of action Dottie's pictures—and the men to whom she gave comfort—have survived.

Lieutenant Van Heflin was able to place a second overseas call to his pretty wife immediately after Christmas. He said wistfully, "I'd give almost anything if I could only see you and Vanna in front of our Christmas tree."

That did it. Frances can't bear the idea of taking down the tree. So she has decided to leave it where it stands in the living room until Van comes back to Hollywood. When last seen, the tree was more haystack than needles.

As you undoubtedly know from news dispatches, Lt. Eddie Albert participated with the Coast Guard in the landings at Tarawa. It was there, a fact that none of us must ever forget, that over a thousand men gave up their lives in 76 short hours.

Fiercely attending to duty, which in this case was the evacuating of wounded men and getting them back to the ships, Lt. Albert literally swam through a sea that broke red on blood-soaked shores.

He told friends with wry solemnity, "I've always said I craved adventure. Well, I got it." But he had never expected adventure to wear so hideous a face.

However, any man who emerges from such an experience abruptly finds himself to be the possessor of such riches as heart can scarcely hold: He is the owner of life, of being, of awareness of the magical power of laughter.

Out of the depths of this laughter, Eddie told of several Marines who came upon a cache of Jap beer and got to work, opening cans with anything that would penetrate tin. Abruptly a grenade landed in their midst, and everyone leaped backward into fox holes and behind cocoanut logs. When, after a fearful few moments, there was no detonation, someone gingerly lifted his head to find another Marine calmly stacking his arms with cans of beer.

"Take cover, you lug," someone yelled. "That grenade's about to go off."

The Marine, almost invisible behind his loot, observed urbanely, "Nope, it won't go off. I took out the powder before I tossed it in there to scare you monkeys away from my beer."

GOLD FISH:

Because their house seemed too big for Ann's wartime need, and because she and Bob have postwar plans for a one-story, rambling house out in the country somewhere, the Sterlings have offered their Beverly Hills home for sale.

Bob came in from his current job of acting in Air Corps training films and made a bee-line for the shower. The sequence which had been shot that day involved the technique of handling a plane on which the oil line had broken. To simulate oil, yet not dissipate such valuable material or run the risk of starting a real fire, the Army producers had been using chocolate sauce in the oil line. Bob was a sweet sight—face the color of molasses and hair likewise.

The shower felt wonderful. He tried a few bars of some unrecognizable air. Hearing voices—apparently from the neighboring bedroom—Bob opened the sand-blasted shower door and thrust out a dripping head. "Zat you, Ann?"

It wasn't Ann. It was the local realtor, showing a family of prospective buyers through the house. "Personally conducted tours at all hours," said Bob cheerfully and closed the door in the faces of the ogling visitors.

RUMOR BLOOMER:

If you haven't seen "Lifeboat" with the incomparable Tallulah Bankhead, run—do not walk—to your nearest theater. Playing opposite her is one of the most exciting personalities to hit town in a long time, name of John Hodiak. After the picture had been seen generally in Hollywood, Metro executives cast a covetous eye upon 20th Century-Fox Studios, where the picture had been made by Alfred Hitchcock, and where—presumably—the desirable Mr. Hodiak was under contract.

Tactful negotiations were begun to borrow this rarest of all local wartime commodities, a rugged leading man. 20th Century was polite and regretful. They would, they allowed, dearly love to lend Mr. Hodiak to Metro, were it not for one technicality. Mr. Hodiak had been borrowed, in the first place, by 20th Century. His contract was held by Metro.

RING, DOUBLE RING:

When Alexis Smith announced her engagement to Craig Stevens, she postscripted the news with a firm declaration that there would be no wedding until the war was over. Recently, however, Craig was given his medical discharge from the Army. A few days later Alexis was spotted amid the lonely floor spaces of a furniture store (no Los Angeles home outfitter has enough merchandise to soil a good-sized dustcloth). Perhaps this means that Alexis has changed her mind about being a lady-in-waiting for the duration, since her personal soldier is home from the wars.

Judy (here with Jack Benny) brainstormed into studio with suggestion that full-sized photos replace postcard-size pics to overseas servicemen. Idea took pushing, but Judy got final O.K.

Edward Arnold and everyone else who'd listen heard Paulette's Spring seeding plans, her overpowering yen for dungarees and good N. Y. soil. Paulette said she'd work farm herself until next pic.

RE-TAKE:

Christmas, 1943, has long been just a memory. About all that remains of the festive season around your house is that Christmas card from a distant friend, giving her new address. You are positively going to write her a long letter—in June.

This being the case, perhaps you can endure a final report on Hollywood Yuletide Highlights, to wit: Annie Sheridan—gifted with a toy train that wound through her entire house—was determined to supply the donor, Steve Hannagan, with a pair of firehouse red silk pajamas to get even with his stunt of having her met in Chicago by the fire chief.

Unfortunately, the demand for red silk pajamas is practically nil, and the haberdashers whom Annie telephoned verbally recoiled from her query. So she bought a pair of white pyjas and had them dyed.

* * *

Just before Christmas, incidentally, Jane Wyman had poked her head into Perc Westmore's make-up department in time to catch him displaying—to his employees—the full-length maribou negligee he had bought for his wife, beautiful red-haired Margaret Donovan. Janie advanced to model the coat and promptly went into ecstasies over it.

On Christmas morning Jane received a duplicate coat from Perc.

And the following is a somewhat belated report on the Whiskers Situation, Hollywood Division, Rental Department.

As you probably know, Cary Grant is the only male member of the Hollywood Women's Press Club, and, as such, acts as Santa Claus by delivering the grab bag (25c) presents which they exchange each year. It has been the custom for some member of the entertainment committee to rent a set of flowing white whiskers and a red cap for Cary.

This year he passed gifts around, wearing a face unblemished by even so little as a faint five o'clock shadow. Someone demanded to know why the traditional beard had been shed.

Explanation: it seems that beards were so much in demand (the supply being scarce) that the rental time was stated in hours instead of days. Cary's whiskers had been rented from 8 A.M. until noon on the day before Christmas, and presentation of Golden Apples took so long that Cary didn't play Santa until 2:30 P.M.

By that time the uneasy-footed rental company had taken its whiskers and departed to its next customer.

"THE FLOOD MAY BEAR ME FAR":

Undoubtedly you read the newspaper account of the launching of the S.S. Carole Lombard, and saw the pictures of Irene Dunne wielding the christening bottle of wine. Many Hollywood know-it-alls have asked why Miss Dunne was selected, as she and Carole had been acquaintances but not close friends.

It happened this way: Mrs. Walter Lang, the beloved "Fieldsie," had been Carole's closest friend. This was so well known that Mrs. Lang was asked to give the short dedicatory speech and to launch the boat. She declined, saying that she would be so emotionally overcome that she would be unable to utter a word. Who, then, the officials asked, would be suitable?

Fieldsie thought it over and reached a conclusion. Of all the women in Hollywood, Irene Dunne had always been the actress most admired by Carole Lombard. Miss Dunne's voice, her graciousness, her perfect poise had been cited repeatedly by Carole as her ideal.

So it was she who consigned to the honesty of the unchanging sea, the honesty of the unchanging spirit called Carole Lombard.

A Smile that Glistens

Mayhap, sassy one, you've been disposed to poke fun at the stories of eternal youth that trickle out of Hollywood via the pens of precocious publicity peddlers. But here's something you can swear by any time you feel the urge: the gilded gals who leave the most famous footprints in the slabs at Grauman's Chinese Theater are the ones who've learned to take care of their health. If you follow their example in hygiene as faithfully as you copy their coifs, you're even smarter than grandma gives you credit for being . . . Take the matter of teeth. Teeth are terribly important, not only to good looks, but to good health. The girls who live by the lens know this. Glance at the pix of June Allyson for a smiling example . . . When June was doing a stint at New York's Capitol Theater, your gallivanting beauty editor fought her way backstage through a crowd of milling fans and cornered June in her dressing room. We were there to pick up any ideas she might have on brightening and improving smiles . . . and we had come to the right place. This Allyson lass is gay as an M-G-M musical. The audience was happy, no end, when June flashed her dazzling white smile . . . "First impressions," said she, "are so important . . . and nobody fails to notice your mouth!" A person just can't be healthy with sick teeth. Teeth grind food. If the teeth are sore, broken-down or missing, digestion is interfered with at the start. 'Nother thing: nothing causes an ill-smelling breath more quickly than decayed teeth or an unclean mouth . . . Brush-work. "Make the tongue-test," is June's idea. Run the tip of your tongue over your teeth . . . inside and out. Feel that filmy coating? It doesn't belong on teeth. It collects stains, makes teeth dull, dingy-looking. Your tongue tells you what others see—filmy coating that dims the natural brilliance of your smile.

June fixed us with a stern eye: "Do you select a toothbrush for the color of its handle instead of the quality of the bristles?" While we were busily denying any such thing, June went on to chat about the all-important brush. "A toothbrush shouldn't be used oftener than once in 24 hours." Right, she is! It's a bright idea to own two toothbrushes. With proper care (which means only cold water is ever applied to the bristles) and 24-hour drying in the open air, a pair of brushes used alternately will do efficient work for about four months.

Choose a toothbrush to fit the mouth. Don't, oh don't, use one whose bristles are broken or loose. Brush the teeth, if possible, after every meal. Also, of course, upon rising and before going to bed. Never saw back and forth, for this injures the gums and cuts grooves in the teeth. Simplest and most effective method consists of a slight rolling, away-from-the-gums motion for the outside walls of the teeth, small-circular strokes for the biting surfaces and a vertical scrubbing for the inner surfaces of the front teeth.

"It's important," added June, "to brush the gums as to brush the teeth." Care must be taken to brush them only in the proper direction; toward the crowns of teeth, never away from them. Brush the upper gums downward, the lower gums upward. This massages them and also sweeps out food particles from between the teeth. June's enthusiastic about the whole subject. 'Fact, she spends ten minutes every morning and evening in caring for her teeth.

Dandy Dentifrice. June's a gal who likes variety. Sometimes she uses a paste, sometimes a liquid, sometimes a powder dentifrice. Whichever you hit upon, if it's a nationally advertised product you can be assured it's scientific tooth cleansing at its best. When you make your choice, use it regularly. You'll be the proud possessor of beautiful white "tooties!"

Dental Floss. June, bright girl, always uses it. Of course, we're talking about dental floss. Don't jam it against the gums. Just insert the dental floss carefully between the teeth and run it along the sides. Floss is wonderful at removing food debris from spots that your brush can't reach. It's important, any dentist will tell you, to remove this stuff for it rots and, among other cheerful things, helps to decay teeth and to taint your breath.

Mouth Wash. Use mouth wash to rinse away any and every particle of food debris after the use of dental floss. In fact, if you're a smart girl, you'll use mouth wash all the time. In this day and age, we needn't go into the hazards of b-a-d b-r-e-a-t-h! Come, come, does yours make you a girl to be looked at, but never danced with? Well, do something about it. Gargle with a fresh, clean-tasting mouth rinse every time you wash your teeth. And here's an extra gleam-tip that June passes along to you: "Once a week scrub your teeth with a pad of cotton saturated in your pet mouth rinse. To reach the back teeth, I twine cotton on an orange stick." This is a neat trick to keep your fangs a-gleam and is especially helpful for lassies who like to smoke a lot.

Food Facts. While we were chatting June munched a ham-on-rye. With pickle on the side. June loves dill pickles and is mighty glad that rationing hasn't hit them yet. All of which brought up a discussion of food and its importance to gleaming teeth. And it's mighty important, say we, joining our soprano to the chorus of all U. S. medicos.

SMILE ROUTINE

SWEEP 'EM CLEAN. Have two toothbrushes both tagged Private Property. You're to use 'em three times a day. And when you spread your dentifrice, it can be liquid, powder or paste. Grasp your firm-bristled brush at an angle and swivel it among your molars. Sweep up from the lower set of teeth and down from the uppers. Give extra attention to the back teeth and the inner sides of your front teeth. Allow three minutes for all this brush work, and you'll notice the difference. Your teeth will be whiter, brighter. Slight stains may sometimes be removed by putting a little dentifrice on a piece of clean gauze and rubbing carefully over the discoloration.

SLICK 'EM SPRUCE. No matter your conscientious sweeping and rinsing, persistent food particles will stick in the crevices and crannies of your teeth. So tote a roll of dental floss with you and use it discreetly after each meal. And we mean discreetly in your own room, not surreptitiously at the table. Do not jerk the floss down under the gums, or saw it back and forth at the gum line. Slip it gently between the teeth. Then slide the floss up and back until every errant food particle has been thoroughly routed. It's a bright idea to go through this routine each morning and at night before turning down the covers. It's an extra bit of insurance against decay.

Laraine Doy, an M-G-M star, smiles brightly.

SWISH 'EM SWEET. A vigorous swishing with mouthwash follows your tooth brushing and that cleansing with dental floss. A mouthwash will remove all the particles that have been loosened by the brush and leave your mouth feeling cool, clean and invigorated. Try a mouthwash immediately after you get up, following each meal and before you retire at night. Hold it in your mouth a few minutes swishing it lazily round and round. It'll give you a baby-sweet breath. Your toothbrushes will give you better service if you remember to wash and rinse them in this same antiseptic mouthwash after each brushing. Why, it just murders those germs!

CHEW 'EM STRONG. The gum chewing habit is a good one for teeth, gums and chin line. But it isn't practical or pretty to do your face grooming in the subway or at a dance. Chew gum as you catch up on your knitting, at your machine in the defense plant, in your good-morning shower. It will keep your smile bright and shining and your chin a firm, lithe, determined line. You can chew your teeth strong the vitamin way, too, if you tuck a raw carrot, two pieces of hard bread, or a stalk of crunchy celery in your lunch basket. Or if yours is a white collar job, slip a hard apple in your pocketbook and gnaw away at it during your lunch hour.

CHECK 'EM OFTEN. Your dentist is not an ogre. Visit him at least twice a year. Let him do a professional cleaning and simonizing job to remove stubborn stains and tartar. He'll polish your teeth until they shine. He can catch tooth decay before it gets too serious and wretched toothaches result. If yours are problem teeth that just break out in cavities, ask your dentist to recommend a special diet. Crooked, uneven teeth can be straightened even if you are over sixteen. And all sorts of wondrous magic can be worked with your molars whether they've been neglected or not. So visit the man with the drill regularly. He'll keep your teeth pretty.

her lip, trying to laugh at herself. It was only Charley Johnson. He popped his head around the edge of the door, grinning.

"Got time for an advertising manager, Boss Lady?" he said.

boss lady . . .

She pursed her lips in annoyance; he was always calling her that, Boss Lady. She didn't like Johnson, for all his vaunted charm; he was a conceited puppy, but for all of that he was the best advertising man in the business.

"What's on your mind, Johnson?" she said shortly.

"The usual thing. Girls," he said.

"That's not very funny," she said.

"I don't like funny girls," Charley said. "I like them beautiful—and feminine."

"So Paxton tells me," Liza said. "Look here Johnson, I don't mind what you do after hours, but Paxton's been hollering his head off that you kept his models out all night, and they look like wet dish rags now. They're not worth a dime for posing, and we've got to get our picture layouts taken today. Stay away from our girls, will you, Johnson?"

"I can't," Johnson said. "It's a hereditary weakness."

She didn't want to argue. She said abruptly: "What did you want?"

"It's about the Easter issue," Johnson said. "I've got a wonderful idea. A circus cover and carry out the same motif all through the book. The advertisers would go for it like a million. I could line up enough ads to tide us over for a year."

"We have a traditional Easter cover," Liza said.

"Traditional—and dull," Johnson said. He laid his layouts on the desk, and she looked at them blankly. Johnson was talking excitedly. His voice was like a dim montage of sound. She felt tired.

"Can I go ahead?" Johnson said.

"You'll do nothing without my okay," she said sharply.

Johnson shrugged: "Okay, Boss Lady." He looked at her insolently, and then quite casually he reached over and stroked the lapel of the smart, tailored suit she was wearing.

"Just like mine," he said. "Only I like bow ties better with it."

He turned laughing and started out of the office. For a moment she hated him and his gibes. Blindly, angrily she reached toward the desk. Her hand closed around a paper weight. In a sudden, conclusive movement, she flung it. It crashed against the wall an inch from Johnson's head. He turned sharply and then bent and picked up the paper weight. He grinned a little.

"Thanks," he said. "I always needed one."

Then he was gone, and Liza Elliott was alone in the office. Alone with the bitter tired feeling and the fright and the ebbing anger. She buried her head in her arms.

Dr. Brooks was a calm man, surprisingly young. He listened impassively while Liza Elliott told him that she had come almost against her will. She didn't want to come, she didn't believe in it. But if there were no other way—she'd try it, be fair. For she was frightened, depressed, panic-stricken. There had to be something that could be done. Dr. Brooks asked her to do only a very simple thing. He asked her to relax on a couch and simply to tell him whatever thoughts passed through her mind. She lay there a while relaxing.

"It's odd," she said. "I keep thinking of the beginning of a little song. I can't remember all of it. Not even the words. But it's been running through my mind for days. Last night, just before I fell asleep, I remember trying to think of the rest of it, beyond this little fragment I know. And it kept running through all of the dream . . ."

"The dream?" Dr. Brooks said. "What did you dream?"

"I can't remember all of it."

"Try," the doctor said. "Try."

"I was in a large room . . . a little like my office . . . but immense . . . and then suddenly there was music . . . out of nowhere a dress came floating down . . . it was ornate and beribboned . . . blue."

"Is that a color you usually wear?"

"I loathe blue," Liza said. "I never wear it."

"The dream?" the doctor said. "Go on."

"Suddenly I was wearing the dress . . . there was a whole crowd of people . . . they were admiring me . . . I seemed to like it . . . I danced for them . . . and they applauded wildly . . . then there was a loud blast of trumpets and a figure came in . . . dressed like a Marine . . . I seemed to recognize the face . . . the face of the advertising manager at the magazine . . . he insisted on painting my portrait . . . he did it there immediately . . . suddenly everyone was laughing at me . . ."

For a moment there was silence in the room and then Dr. Brooks said mildly: "How long have you been working for the magazine, Miss Elliot?"

"Ten years." she said. "I started it."

"Your own money?"

"No," she said. "A publisher backed me. Kendall Nesbitt." She paused slightly and then added dryly: "Perhaps you might as well know now. Mr. Nesbitt is in love with me, has been all the time. He'd marry me, but his wife won't divorce him."

Dr. Brooks nodded calmly: "About the dream. Doesn't it strike you odd that you should dream of a woman who is so entirely your opposite, one who likes glamorous dresses, wants to be admired for her beauty. Or is that what you really want?"

Liza said sharply: "Of course not. I despise useless women. If I wanted glamorous dresses, do you think I should have to dream about them. I'd only have to reach out my hand and take."

She was still thinking of the doctor's words when she returned to the office a little later. She swung down the smart hall, and out of a doorway one of the girls, a clerk, brushed by her hurriedly, apologized quickly and then went running down the hall, saying ecstatically: "He's here!" Her office was empty. Almost all the offices were empty, it seemed. She frowned. Then she heard the noise coming from the photographic studio.

gorgeous hunk . . .

They were all in there, the whole staff, girls and women, crowded around the figure of a man. He was tall, handsome, broad-shouldered. She heard a fragment of words as a girl said, sighing: ". . . what a hunk of man . . ." Then she recognized him. Randy Curtis, the movie star.

Of course; he'd been due for a series of pictures for a layout in the magazine. But to create such an uproar! She raised her voice sharply.

"Girls," she said. "This is disgraceful. Mr. Curtis is here on business. I'm sure he doesn't relish being mauled!"

When they were gone, a little sheepishly, but looking back over their shoulders for one last look, she apologized to him for their rudeness.

"You don't remember me," he said. "We met once before. A year ago. You promised to have a drink with me. We never did get around to it."

"If it will make amends—" Liza said.

Randy said eagerly: "This afternoon?"

"I'm afraid not."

"Then tomorrow. Tomorrow night."

Liza smiled graciously: "All right, then. Tomorrow night. I may be a little late. We're going to press, and I may have to stay overtime."

no time for love . . .

She walked back to her office swiftly, a little eager to get at her work. That was the only thing that saved her really. Immersed in her work, she could forget the other things, the nagging fear and the sudden depressions. She was glad she'd gone to Dr. Brooks. She felt a little better.

She found Kendall Nesbitt waiting for her. Kendall seemed to be in an odd mood. There was a repressed gaiety about him. He took her arm and mysteriously steered her out to the terrace. Below them New York lay silver with sunlight.

"Liza," Kendall said. "You'll never guess."

"Guess what?" she said.

"Kate's promised to give me a divorce. Did you hear that, Liza? She'll divorce me. Of course she's driving a hard bargain. She gets almost everything but the kitchen sink. But we'll be free, finally. It's worth anything to me. I've been worried about you, Liza . . ."

"I'm all right, Ken."

"Think of it, Liza. Free. We'll be able to do what we've always wanted. Isn't it wonderful news?"

Was it? Was it? Was she too tired to think? Or was there something else. She could feel nothing. What was it Ken was saying? A divorce. And then, free. Free for what? To marry.

"Liza," Ken said. "It is good news, isn't it?"

"Wonderful, Ken," she said. "Only I'm a little tired now. Just let me think about it a while."

His name kept whirling through her mind: Kendall . . . Kendall . . . Kendall Nesbitt . . . On the way home and then later in the little study in her apartment: Kendall, Kendall, Kendall Nesbitt. She found herself humming and then stopped abruptly for it was the same fragment of a song, the song she couldn't remember. She flung herself face down on the bed. She was tired. So tired. The name kept whirling through her mind: Kendall, Kendall, Kendall Nesbitt.

Was that her . . . where was she . . . oh, all the girls were running . . . where were they running . . . wasn't that a statue there . . . no it wasn't a statue . . . they were running toward a man . . . she knew him . . . of course, she did . . . it was Randy Curtis . . . look at me Randy, look at me . . . wasn't she beautiful . . . wasn't she? . . . what was that music . . . it sounded like a wedding march . . . why, it was for her . . . look at the dress she was wearing . . . it was a wedding gown . . . it was Liza Elliott's wedding day . . . here comes the bride . . . and the minister . . . why, he looked familiar . . . it was Charley Johnson . . . do you take this man . . . of course she did, wasn't it Randy Curtis . . . why no, it wasn't . . . it was Kendall . . . what happened to the music . . . why were all the girls shouting at her . . . what were they saying . . . you don't love that man, you don't love that man . . . get away . . . get away . . . she was climbing . . . away . . . away . . . and then suddenly she wasn't wearing the wedding dress anymore . . . it was the blue dress . . . and she could see someone . . . it was her father . . . she was running to him, hands outstretched . . . Daddy . . . Daddy . . . why was he looking at her like that . . . why was he saying, take that dress off, take it off immediately . . .

Dr. Brooks listened intently while she told him of the dream. For a moment he didn't say anything, and then he spoke carefully.

"In your dream you think you're marrying Randy Curtis, but it turns out to be Kendall Nesbitt. Then you see your father, and you run to him, is that right?"

"Yes, that's right."

"You're not sure you want to marry Kendall Nesbitt, are you?"

"No. I'd given up the idea. I was satisfied with things at they were."

"Isn't it possible that you never wanted to marry him. That your affection for him is based on the fact that he resembled your father. That really, he was a refuge to you; as long as you thought you were in love with him and there was no chance of marrying him, it kept you safe from competing with other women for a man . . ."

"You mean that I'm afraid to compete with other women?"

"Exactly. You don't dare."

She said angrily: "That's ridiculous."

"Is it?" the doctor said. "I think you'll find the interpretation is correct."

"I'll find nothing," she said sharply. "Because I'm not going on with the analysis. You're entitled to your interpretation, Doctor. I'm entitled to mine. Good-by."

Back at the offices of "Allure," Charley Johnson was waiting for her, his good-natured face a little sober, but still grinning that infectious, maddening grin.

"Well, Boss Lady," he said, "what about the circus cover?"

"I haven't decided yet."

"I wish you would," he said. "I want to go out in a blaze of glory."

"Go out?" she said. "What do you mean?"

"It's my last issue, Boss Lady. I'm quitting. Got a better offer. I hate breaking your heart, leaving. But you'll bear up."

"Look here, Johnson," she said sharply. "I don't like you. I admit it. But I like your work. I'll meet any offer you can get elsewhere. Fair enough?"

insolent pup . . .

"You couldn't meet the offer, Boss Lady. You see, I'm after your job. At this other place I run the whole show. Here, well here you're married to your desk, aren't you, Boss Lady?"

"You insolent puppy," she shouted.

"Now, now—" Johnson said. "Naughty."

"Get out!" she snapped.

Charley Johnson grinned. He took the paper weight she had once thrown at him out of his pocket and toyed with it in his hand: "Mind if I keep it?" he said.

"Get out!"

She had no peace. Suddenly her whole, small tight world was crumbling around her; the familiar world she had dominated for so long was becoming a frightening place, full of alarms and fears. She went back to her office, determined to work. But she couldn't make her mind concentrate on the details before her. Every small decision was painful. She couldn't make up her mind. She was staring angrily at her desk when her secretary announced Randy Curtis. She had almost forgotten.

Randy was splendid in white tie and tails. He came into the office with a great, handsome rush. He stood staring at her, plain in her tailored suit.

She said: "I'm sorry if I'm a little late, Randy. I haven't had time to change."

"Don't change," he said eagerly. "Go as you are. I was so afraid I'd run into a glamour girl again. I'm sick of them."

"Are you?"

"That's what I always liked about you."

Liza Elliott frowned deeply. "What?"

"You're so smart, so tailored, so efficient. You don't know what a relief it is."

As from a long distance the memory of the doctor's voice whispered in her ear. ". . . you're afraid to compete with other women . . . you're afraid . . . you don't dare." She was suddenly angry.

"I'm afraid I am going to dress, Randy."

They went to all the swank places, and she was striking in a wonderful gown. Randy was attentive. Sometimes, it seemed as if he were in love with her.

At the Monaco Club, later that night, they ran into Charley Johnson and a blonde. The blonde knew Randy from Hollywood. She prattled on while Liza sat stiff.

Charley Johnson slipped into the seat next to Liza: "Boss Lady," he said. "You look almost human."

The blonde was saying to her: "Of course, everybody's crazy about Randy. I am, too. But he won't give me a tumble."

"You don't like me," Charley said. "Because I want your job. You don't like my blonde either. She wants your man . . ."

Liza stood up suddenly; Charley Johnson said. "What's the matter, Boss Lady?"

"Randy," Liza said. "You won't mind, will you? I've got to go now. I've still work to do, you know."

She started toward the door. Randy was following after her awkwardly. She heard Charley Johnson's mocking laugh, "What's the matter? Can't take it? Can't stand competition, Boss Lady?"

On the desk in her room the Easter cover for the magazine gleamed in the soft light. Next to it lay Charley Johnson's layout for the Circus cover. She wanted to do something. To stop thinking about Randy Curtis and Kendall Nesbitt, she stared from one cover to the other, concentrating. One or the other. The Circus cover or the Easter cover. She grinned wryly at herself. She couldn't even decide that any more. The covers whirled before her tired eyes. The Easter cover or the Circus cover . . . which . . . Easter . . . Circus . . . Circus . . . Circus . . .

What happened . . . look, the animals were moving . . . the circus cover was alive . . . they were pulling a cage into the ring . . . who was that in it . . . why it was herself . . . and there was Charley Johnson . . . the ringmaster . . . he was opening the cage . . . he was leading her toward a shadowy figure . . . why, it was a judge . . . they were putting her on trial . . . they were going to make her make up her mind . . . and there, there on the white horse . . . that was Randy Curtis . . . he was going to defend her . . . now there was a witness in the box . . . Kendall Nesbitt . . . she can't make up her mind . . . what was that music they were playing . . . the song again . . . no, no, not that, please don't play that . . .

Dr. Brooks said gently: "So you had this dream or hallucination, call it what you will, and you've come back to me?"

"I must get to the bottom of it," Liza said. "I'm sorry I ran out. I'll do everything I can to help."

"The blue dress," Dr. Brooks said. "Evidently it has something to do with your father. Can't you remember anything about it at all?"

"Yes," she said. "It was my mother's favorite dress. She was a beautiful woman. She was disappointed in me, and I knew she was. It hurt me terribly. I wanted so to be beautiful.

"I remember, after she died. I was only a child. I saw how sad my father was, and I wanted to do something to please him. I stole up to my mother's room. I found her favorite blue dress there. I thought somehow it might please him if I put it on, let him see it again. He found me there, trying it on. I think it was the only time in his life he ever spoke a harsh word to me. I ran to my room crying

"And ever since then you've hated blue?"

"Yes. I vowed then that I was going to win a place in the world. I knew I could never do it by beauty. I studied. And I worked. Well, I was a success . . ."

"And the song . . . the fragment that keeps running through your mind?"

"It was a song my father taught me."

For a moment Dr. Brooks considered. Then he spoke quietly. "I think we can see the full pattern now," he exclaimed. "You've been afraid of beauty because your mother was so beautiful, and you were so plain as a child. You were shocked, then. You built a wall against the outside world. This breakdown is a rebellion against that wall. You can't deny your womanhood forever, Miss Elliott. Perhaps what you need now is love."

"Thank you, perhaps you're right."

Randy Curtis was waiting for her. For the first time in months she felt herself free to smile. The weight was gone.

"Liza, I want you to marry me."

"Marry you?"

He said quickly: "It won't mean giving up anything. Look, I've been offered a chance to set up my own production unit in Hollywood. I'm afraid of it. But if I knew someone like you would help me, I'd take it. It hasn't got anything to do with why I love you. Or maybe it has."

Suddenly she wanted to laugh. Poor Randy. He needed the same thing she needed. Security. A sense of being cared for. He wanted a mother.

She said no to him as gracefully as she could. He finally left, and then she sat down calmly at her desk. Now is the time, she thought wryly, for all good men to come to the aid of Liza Elliott. Someone knocked on the door. Charley entered.

"Look," he said. "I have an apology to make, or should make. I've needled you and egged you on. But I can't really apologize because deep down I feel I was right.

"Maybe it's because down deep, really, too, I've always liked you. I got a look at you last night, Liza. You're lovely."

Suddenly she was looking at him. Nice hair. Nice smile. Nice way of talking. Charming. She felt a deep hidden stir.

"Charley," she said, "I want you to stay. Don't quit."

He shrugged: "I'd like to," he said. "You know my terms."

"Maybe we can run the magazine together, Charley. And then if it works out all right, I can even get a divorce from my desk. You might like that."

"For more reasons than one," he said.

The other reasons came out while they were working on the Circus issue. She was bent over the layout, and then suddenly his face was beside her, pointing out some detail. Their eyes met. It was strange: Suddenly the whole room seemed to melt away, and there was nothing in the world but the even stare of his eyes. And it wasn't until a little while later that she realized he was kissing her.

Afraid? Liza Elliott afraid of love?

She kissed him again.

Time? How she did it heaven only knows, because she was already scraping to the bone. But somehow she managed to scrape beyond the bone and to buy her younger daughter a pair of skates.

Marion was the lady, Betty the hellion. Marion had the face of an angel, Betty was a plain little frecklepuss. Everybody loved Marion. Except to her mother, Betty was a wild young nuisance. And Betty got a whale of an inferiority complex.

low man . . .

In those days she didn't know a complex from a hole in the wall. All she knew was, it hurt like fury to see Marion fussed over while she was ignored. So she danced and hollered and screamed and sang and peeked out of the corner of an eye to see if anyone was looking. Asserting your individuality, the psychologists call it.

By any name, Marion didn't like it.

"Do you have to be so loud?"

"Do you have to be such a prude?"

"You're just making a show of yourself."

"Oh, break down and be human."

Marion was the wholesome sweater-and-skirt girl. She didn't use make-up till she was 16. Betty was all for ruffles and lipstick and being an actress. When people said, "Why aren't you like your sister?" she'd burn. And burn all the hotter, because she'd have asked nothing better than to be a beauty and a lady like Marion.

They were alike in two things. Both adored their mother. Both hated their poverty. Marion tried to put up a front against it. Betty stamped her foot. "We're poor. Why not say we're poor?"

Yet, deeper than their temperamental differences ran the bond of kinship. As kids, they were always scrapping. Marion was the stronger of the two. She might get Betty down for the count, but she'd never hurt her. "Some day," she'd promise, "I'm going to slow you." (Slow was her own word and it rhymed with cow.) Betty would stick her tongue out. She knew her Marion.

And headstrong though she was, she recognized the fact that Marion was wiser in the ways of the heart. One night the larder held only a can of beans. Mother said she wasn't hungry.

"Then I won't eat either," stormed Betty.

Marion, dividing the beans, gave her a look that shut her up. "Listen," she said, low-voiced, "you're not helping mother any. She's got to be tough. It would only hurt her worse if we didn't eat. She'd lose that toughness she needs to stand up to things. Now you eat if it chokes you—"

Betty ate.

When Marion got a job in a drugstore, she'd sneak candy and sodas home to the brat. And she did something else the brat will never forget. Once in a blue moon Marion got a new dress. Betty never did. Being the younger, she'd have to wear Marion's hand-me-downs. Worse than anything else, she wanted a dress no one else had ever worn, and Marion bought it for her. Not only the dress, but a hat and bag and shoes. It took her months to pay for them.

Just the same, not till both were launched on their professional careers, did they really draw close. Partly it was the process of growing up—partly the fact that now for the first time Marion followed where Betty led. Boy, was that balm to a bruised and battered ego! Here at last was something she knew more about than her sister. Something she could wrestle with.

Marion was singing at the Nuthouse in Detroit when Betty got her job with Vincent Lopez. Marion had never sung before—but if Betty could, why couldn't she? That was fine with Betty. She knew their money lay in the entertainment field. Mother'd had it all fixed up for her to be a secretary, Marion a nurse, but Mother reckoned without the driving ambition of her youngest. The world with a fence around it—that's what Betty wanted. Nuts to 25 a week.

With the Lopez outfit, she went to Atlanta. A hotel manager said: "Where can I get a vocalist like you?"

"I've got a sister who sings just like me." Which was true up to a point. Their style is similar, only Marion's not so wild.

On Betty's say-so, her sister was hired. Next, she talked Lopez into giving Marion a four-week engagement. Both girls sang with the band in Boston, and Betty did the managing. Marion had to take her name—she'd been changed from Thornburg to Hutton by the process of numerology. Marion had to wear the same kind of dress—a style Betty herself had designed to work in. The night Glenn Miller came in, Betty gave Marion her best numbers to do. Then she collared Miller. "How about giving my sister a job?"

"I'll try her out. If I keep her, you pay the plane fare. If not, I'll pay it."

He kept her. Pretty soon they were both in New York, Marion making 50 a week, Betty a smart 65. Betty wowed 'em at the Casa Manana, Marion's chance was coming up. Miller was about to open at a big night spot—and Marion came down with a cold.

now I lay me down to sleep . . .

But a cold. Pneumonia, practically. On opening day, she wandered into Betty's place, looking like a ghost. Mother's heart dropped into her boots. Betty started tearing round. Phone the chiropractor. Let him fix her up enough, so at least she can go on. Get her into bed. Make a hot stew. Get her out of bed. Dress her. Make her up. You look swell, kid. Come on, let's go—

But first they knelt down beside their mother. "From pups on up to big cows," as Betty tells it, they'd said their prayers every night at their mother's knee. And at moments of crisis, they continued to pray together. Putting themselves on the right side of God, they called it.

Marion was a sensation that night, and zoomed on up from there.

The two are as different today as when they were kids. Everybody still loves Marion. "Not me," says Betty, who still can't be bothered with lies. "I'm not sweet and charming, and I never intend to be. It would bore me stiff."

Marion remains serene, like a mountain lake. Betty's turbulent as ever, a plunging torrent that no dam can hold. It takes Marion months to be your friend, but once she's accepted you, she's your friend for life. Betty can love today and hate tomorrow— Marion takes time to sit down and write long letters. Betty wires or phones.

mother by proxy . . .

"I'm selfish," she says. That depends on the point of view. Several weeks before Christmas, Marion wrote that her husband had been called to the service. It was a lonely letter, and between its lines, Betty read an appeal. Christmas was coming. Marion would be alone at Christmas-time. But if Mother went to her, Betty would be alone. She couldn't quite face it—

So she went to work, and couldn't keep her mind on the work. Marion's letter haunted her, Marion's face got between her and her lines. At home, the phone rang.

Mrs. Hutton picked it up. "Better get your bags packed, Ma, and be on your way."

With Marion husband and child come first. She turned down an M-G-M contract because it would have meant long separations from Jack. Now Jack's in the Army, so she's got to work. But she'd rather be at home with him and the baby.

With Betty, career comes first. She looks at her sister and yearns for what Marion has—marriage to the man she loves, an adorable kid. She knows that Marion's still wiser than she in the ways of the heart. But she knows herself, too.

Jack Philbin was managing Glenn Miller's band when Marion joined it. They fell in love and married. For Marion, it was as simple as that.

From the moment she heard a baby was on the way, Betty went wild. "Our baby" she called it even before it was born. As she was getting ready for a show one day, Marion walked in. "Sister, I feel so strange. I've got spots in front of my eyes—"

She phoned the doctor, and Marion was rushed to the hospital. Somehow she got through her performance, tore over to the hospital and arrived as they were taking the baby from the delivery room. All she could see were the two blue marks on his forehead where the instruments had touched him, and brother, she was fit to be tied. Out she stormed and flew at the doctor.

"You've scarred our baby."

He managed to keep her at arm's length. "Now hold it, Betty. What are you talking about?"

"Those two blue marks. What kind of a thing is that to do to a kid?"

"They'll disappear."

"When?"

"In a couple of weeks."

Her eyes filled. "If they don't," she gulped, "you're a dead duck, doctor."

Soon after, she went to Hollywood. Last time she saw her nephew, he was just under two. He looks like her and, when she takes him out, she pretends she's his mother. One day they were in a taxi together, John standing beside her, peering out the back window. Suddenly he turned and looked at her, as if he were seeing her for the first time. With a funny little gurgle, he put his arms round her neck and planted a soft wet smack on her cheek. For that thrill she wouldn't take a thousand bucks. She bawled for 15 minutes.

Yes, she wants home and husband and baby, but she can't compromise.

Because you can't have her kind of ambition and divide your energies. It's no ordinary ambition. She's driven by a force beyond her understanding. She aches and hungers with a burning intensity to get to the top. She wants all of life; she wants something way up there that she can't reach, and she's going to reach it if it kills her.

For that kind of success, you've got to gamble. Marion won't. Betty begged her to go out alone when she left the band. Marion was scared. She joined the "Modernaires" instead. Later she quit them to stay with her family. Then when Jack was called, her place with the "Modernaires" was filled. So she had to go out alone, and she's doing fine. But she didn't jump from the diving board, she was pushed.

No gamble's too great for Betty. When "Incendiary Blonde" came up, the Paramount biggies sent for her. "Are you ready to shoot the works?"

She knew what they meant. If she missed, it might set her back five years. She was scared blue, but they weren't going to know it. "I'm ready," she told them. "God help me," she said to herself.

When the day's over, she's too tired for anything but bed. She couldn't be a wife and mother, too—not the kind she wants to be. She might try to talk herself into it, but deep down in her heart she knows it's not in the cards. And no matter how hard she fell for a man, if he tried to take her work away, she'd hate him.

mr. genie . . .

Marion's life is happier, hers is more exciting. Marion's proud as punch over Betty's success. No touch of professional jealousy clouds her feeling. "If it had been the other way 'round," says honest Betty, "I wouldn't have been so happy."

Marion says: "It doesn't mean that much to me. Only the people you love matter."

Betty cries: "All of life is important. If you've lived, you're rich and it shows. Otherwise, you grow old and get narrower and narrower till you're nothing."

But if some genie showed up and said, "Love or career, sister! You can't have both. Take your pick," she'd knock him down and sit on him.

"I'm having both. I'm squeezing all I want out of this first, and I'm getting the other, too. Want to make something of it?"

Mr. G., being no dope, would holler uncle. After all, why not? The whole girl is 22. She's got time.

EVEN IN THE BEST OF FAMILIES . . .

It's not that the screen has permanently lost its savor, but that the war has dwarfed everything else. Acting is something he did in another life. His mind has no room for it now. Morning or noon, midnight or five o'clock, he's buried deep in the war. Every scrap of news, every analysis, every commentary is duck-soup to Ronnie. Nothing else is worth reading, nothing else worth talking about.

The war's also of paramount importance to Jane. As you know from Modern Screen, she's poured her time and strength into war work, in Hollywood and out. But like most of us, she needs occasional surcease from the subject. Ronnie doesn't.

Jane has served a long apprenticeship at Warners'. Time was when her recognition as a star would have called for cheers and whoopee from Ronnie. His own brand of whoopee, to be sure. Nothing ostentatious on the surface, but definitely steamed up inside.

armchair generals . . .

As it was, he only said: "That's swell, Janie. It's about time. By the way, did you see that story on page 3 of the 'Times'? It says—"

She looked wildly about for something to hit him over the head with.

Jane is devoted to her brother-in-law. But when Ronnie's home of an evening, Neil's arrival sends her heart into her boots. Argument is meat and drink to them both, and they'd rather argue about the war than sit down to a pre-Pearl Harbor steak. As for trying to break them up, a butterfly might as well try to break up a couple of bears. They don't even hear her. Or at most, one or the other will flap an abstracted hand—

"Shoo-fly, huh?" she said bitterly one night. "Okay, gentlemen. I'm going to bed."

If she thought they'd stop her, she had another think coming. Their voices rose to the bedroom, where she was trying to read. She stuffed her ears with her fingers, but the sound filtered through. Suddenly the sense of her injuries overwhelmed her. Down went the book. Was she a woman or a worm? She rang for Nanny.

"Will you please ask Mr. Reagan to come up?"

"Which one?"

"Both of them."

Nanny, she decided, was a better man than she was. At least they came up.

"Moon," she began firmly, "you've got to go home."

"Why, what did I do?"

Her firmness broke into a wail. "First you won't let me get a word in edgewise, and now I can't even read. Don't look at me that way," she blubbered. "I know nothing matters but the war. But somewhere there are beautiful people who do talk about something else some of the time—"

By now Ronnie's arms were around her, and the rest was smothered in his chest. It was just as well that she missed the glance exchanged by her menfolk. "Women!" said the glance.

But if Ronnie's shoved movies out of his life for the present, it's plain that the fans haven't shoved him out. Along with other screen personalities, he and Jane were asked to attend the first birthday party of the Hollywood Canteen. Since his post isn't far from Hollywood, Ronnie agreed. But he wouldn't sit on the platform. He was in the Army, he wasn't a star. He'd sit with the audience.

That didn't faze Bob Hope, who emceed. He introduced Ronnie from the audience, and the boys went wild. The din was so deafening, you couldn't hear yourself think. On and on it went, Bob beaming, Ronnie blushing—his eyes pleading with Bob to call a halt. Instead of which, Bob started it all over again by yelling through a lull: "For my money, that rates another bow, Captain Reagan."

Of course he was pleased. Who that's human wouldn't be? But he didn't say a word—then or later. Just grinned what Jane calls his "cute, crazy grin."

Indirectly, Bob Hope also had a hand in Jane's new deal at Warners'. With no pictures lined up after "One More Tomorrow," she was planning another camp tour. One night she went to a party at Mack Miller's. Bob and his wife were among the guests. Judy Garland sang, then Jane was asked to sing. Bob whispered to Mack: "I've got to get that girl on my program."

Mack told Jane. "You're kidding!" she gasped, having played in professional hard luck so long that she'd almost quit believing in the other kind.

But sure enough, along came Bob. "When do you finish 'One More Tomorrow'? How about a spot on my show afterwards?"

She had two camp shows to do first—one at Las Vegas, the other at Lemoor Field. The latter was a Christmas present to Hick Marks, Mary Benny's brother.

"Any chance of your coming to sing for us?" he'd asked.

She'd been racking her head about a gift for Hick. What could you get a guy whose sister and brother-in-law were the Jack Bennys, who gave him everything? Well, here was something they couldn't give him.

"I'll make a deal with you, Hick. I'll come up in my free time, and that'll be your Christmas present—"

"Okay, if you come in cellophane and a bow—"

On her return, she did the Hope show—sang "Fuddy-duddy Watchmaker" and had a comedy routine with Bob. It proved to be one of his most successful airers. Suddenly the town re-awoke to Jane. Everything happened at once. A radio bid from Abbott and Costello. Stirring at the studio. Alex Gottlieb handing her a script, called "Make Your Own Bed"—a honey of a script.

"Glad you like it," said Gottlieb. "We're teaming you and Carson in it—" claim to fame . . .

That was to Jane's career what the first robin is to spring—a harbinger, a symbol of new birth. Because here was a producer telling her about her next picture. Whereas for lo! these many moons she'd been getting the glad tidings from the wardrobe department. "Come in for a fitting," they'd phone. And being no dope, she'd deduced that a picture was coming up.

All that's changed now. No fanfare accompanied her graduation to stardom. It never does. Nobody sends you a notice or throws you a party or even gives you a passing pat on the back. One day you happen to see an advance billing. Instead of "Hearts and Flowers" with Winnie Whatapuss, it reads WINNIE WHATAPUSS in "Hearts and Flowers." So you know you're in.

That's how it happened to Jane. She meandered over to Ann Sheridan's dressing room.

"What's different about being a star, Annie? Do folks tip their hats? Or serve you golden pickles in the Green Room?"

Ann. was busy with a lipstick. "The difference," she threw back over her shoulder, "is that when you take a suspension, you get bigger headlines in the columns."

Just the same, don't miss "Make Your Own Bed," if you want to see BUTTONNOSE coming into her own. (Adv).

Between her duties as Jane Wyman and Jane Reagan, life continues at a mad clip. Thanks to Nanny, she no longer has to wield the dust cloth, though it wouldn't be Jane if she didn't run a finger over the woodwork in moments of abstraction. On the whole, however, the household spins smoothly. X, the unknown quantity, stands for Maureen and the dogs.

"If Scotty and Soda weren't our children in another incarnation," says Jane, "they should have been."

Scotty takes after her, Soda after Ronnie. Scotty rants and tears and ties himself up into bowknots. Soda watches the goings-on with reflective detachment, and Jane wouldn't be too surprised to hear him say: "Take it easy, hon. Now about the Polish question—" the great sinner . . .

They have one thing in common—the wanderlust. Gates and hedges can't hold them. They crawl through one, and sooner or later, somebody's bound to leave the other ajar. Also, as if by pre-arranged plan, they choose that moment to disappear when Jane is about to leave for the studio. While she's beating the bushes for them, the phone rings. They've been picked up, trotting in brotherly companionship round the corner of Melrose and Fairfax, miles away.

"How'd they ever get this far?" asks the picker-upper.

"Must've hitch-hiked," groans Jane.

It turns out that Scotty has a conscience. Not long ago he killed a neighbor's chicken. Plunking down two fifty, Jane bethought herself of the huge hen it would have bought, and turned a cold eye on her dog. Next day a strange voice called.

"Have you lost a black Scotty? We found him under a pew in our church. Looked so woebegone, we figured he must be a great sinner."

As for Maureen, she's reached the copycat stage, and Mother's her model. It therefore behooves Mother to watch her step. Some of Maureen's imitations are just funny. Others are funny but.

Jane gets home tired. She says she's tired, she says it several times, she makes quite a thing of being tired. Next morning down trots Maureen, fresh as a daisy after 12 hours in bed. Suddenly Jane hears a sigh, heaved all the way up from her daughter's toes. Maureen's arm rests on the table, her head on the arm.

"What's the matter, Maureen?"

"Oh, I'm so tired, Mummy."

That one's just funny. On the other hand—

The Reagans don't go in for conventional terms of endearment. When Jane's feeling really affectionate, she's likely to address Ronnie fondly as "you old goat—"

On the bus with Nanny one day, Maureen looked particularly fetching in a white bunny coat and cap. Smitten with her charms, an elderly lady began whinnying over her in the way elderly ladies have. Maureen eyed her stonily—

"Say hello to the lady, Maureen,—"

"Hello, you old goat."

Nanny jerked her off the bus. At home Mother gave her a talking-to, uneasily conscious that this was all her own fault. Maureen was conscious of it, too. "Well, you said it—"

"Well, I made a horrible mistake."

The child seemed to be thinking that one over, so Jane let it rest. That night she was tucking her into bed. "Good-night, darling, and God bless you."

"God bless you, too, you old goat," said Maureen with the smile of an angel. "Excuse me, I made a horrible mistake."

Discipline has just begun to be a problem. Up to now, a fairly simple device has worked. Maureen would be sent to her room and told to recite her misdeeds to her favorite doll. This proved such a devastating experience that it wasn't long before a small voice was quavering: "I'm sorry, Mummy."

As the years creep up on her though, she grows more complex. Ronnie was at home for the holidays. It was dinner time. Jane was due at a radio rehearsal, and sat down with her hat on for a bowl of soup. At this point Maureen decided she wouldn't have any soup.

"If you don't eat it now," said Jane, "you'll get it for breakfast, then lunch, then dinner, till you do eat it."

"I won't," said Maureen.

She was sent to stand in a corner in the hall. Which produced no effect. The underlip quivered, but she wouldn't cry.

"Ronnie, will you discipline her for me tonight? I just haven't time."

Ronnie's method, as you might suspect, is reasoning. He reasoned, making no perceptible progress till the distracted Jane swooped down on them both, bore her child upstairs and treated her to her first spanking.

Then of course, the minute she was out of the house, her heart began to smite her, and she couldn't wait to get home. Maureen was asleep, with her usual bodyguard—on one side, the Army murl (mule, to be technical) and the healthy monkey—on the other, the sick monkey (because ear is gone) and Bobby Jiggs, named after the beloved pup of Ronnie's childhood. She won't go to sleep without them, and her last tender glance is for the earless monkey. "You sick? Hm?— Take your pill then—"

Jane sought fearfully for traces of tears, but the cherubic face between the toy animals looked tranquil as always.

"Ronnie, d'you think she hates me for having spanked her?"

"Not since I fixed you up."

"How?"

"Sneaked her some supper. With love from Mummy."

But the storms are few. Mostly, Maureen lives in the sunshine, and the sun shines especially bright when Daddy's at home. There are some games you have to have Daddy for. Like the bus game and the camp game.

all aboard . . .

The bus game is played on a long bench that stands at the foot of Jane's bed. All three bestride it, Maureen's chubby legs sticking out in front, Daddy as conductor in the rear, Jane tucked between.

"Lady, where are you going?" the conductor asks.

"I'm goin' to Cucamonga." (That's another word she likes the sound of.) "Where you goin'?"

"I'm going to San Francisco. Fares, please."

That's Jane's cue. "Just a moment. I know I'm a mere mother, but would anyone on this bus care to know where I'm going?"

For some reason, that hits Maureen as the joke of the world. It takes the combined efforts of her fellow-travelers to keep her from rolling off the bus in hysterics.

For the camp game, Mother and Daddy are lined up on the sofa. They're soldiers. Enter Maureen. "Fellas, I'm goin' to sing you a song, want to hear it?—Packin'-pistol mah-ma, yay yat pistol down. Yat's good," crows Maureen, th being the only sound that throws her.

Or: "Shoo-shoo, baby, your daddy's off—" An anxious frown gathers. "Where you off to, Daddy?"

She wanted Santa Claus to bring her a doll's house, but Jane couldn't find one. Nor a doll's buggy. She did finally manage to run down a doll's bed.

"That's from me," she told Ronnie pointedly. "What are you giving her?"

"I don't have time to wrestle with Christmas crowds. Can't the bed be from both of us?"

"But you're the child's father. You should get her something or other—"

She might have relented and bought it for him, if she hadn't come down with the flu just before Christmas. So sure enough, Ronnie appeared on Christmas Eve, pleased as Punch, a long something-or-other under his arm.

"Look what I found in a little toyshop—" Unwrapped, it proved to be a wooden duck-on-a-stick.

"Is that your daughter's Christmas present?"

"Why not? It cost a dollar. This is war."

dead duck . . .

On Christmas morning, aunts, uncles and grannies gathered for that high moment when Maureen would see what Santa Claus had brought. Ronnie carried Jane, still running a temperature, down to the living room. The tree looked pretty skimpy—not only because you couldn't buy ornaments, but because the cream of their leftovers—including the crowning star—had been used to trim the small tree in Maureen's room.

They'd unwrapped everything—the bed and the duck, the cardboard dollhouse from Julie Payne, the rocking-horse and the miniature spinet from other kind friends. They were all in plain view under the tree when Maureen came in. But her eyes went to the top of the tree, and filled with woe. Nobody said anything for a moment, because nobody knew quite what to make of it. She walked over and laid her cheek against one of the branches. "Poor tree," she said softly. "Yere's no star on top."

That fixed Jane. She had to go back to bed. So she missed seeing father and daughter push the duck around. With Maureen, it was love at first sight. They pushed it till it broke and had to be mended with tape. It is now the sick duck.

Do's and Don'ts

every woman absentee should know

A WAR-PLANT NURSE WROTE KOTEX that their greatest number of absentees are women who miss 1 to 3 days of work each month, frequently on "problem days".

These hints are just a few of the many in the new 24-page booklet we offer free to help you feel better and stay on the job every day. Lost days mean lost lives!

DON'T wrestle with these heavy jobs on "difficult days". Straining is harmful, and your foreman would rather give you lighter work at this time than have you on the absentee list. Send for the new free booklet "That Day Is Here Again" for tips on how to lift the safe way!

DO but don't overdo, and you needn't skip the "swing shift"! But why not wait for the waltzes and rhumbas and leave the jitterbug tactics 'til next week? Sit out a dance now and then . . . to look at the stars or hear a life story. You can always say your feet hurt!

DON'T get the late-at-night cocktail habit . . . too much stimulation is bad at any time! And on these days, more than ever, you can't afford that logey, let-down feeling! Make it a rule to get your full 8 hours sleep every night! You won't be a sissy . . . you'll be smart!

DO send for this free booklet —lost days mean lost lives!

"That Day Is Here Again" contains 24 lively pages of do's and don'ts for war-workers' "problem days". A full page of suggested exercises to curb cramps. When to see your doctor. Facts for older women; and for when the stork's expected. Plain talk about tampons. We take pride in bringing you this authentic information just as we take pride that more women choose Kotex* sanitary napkins than all other brands of pads put together.

Jane gave Ronnie the two lots adjoining theirs. It couldn't be a surprise, because they own everything jointly, and he had to sign the papers. But lots and no surprise, he assured her, were infinitely preferable to surprise and no lots.

He gave her a delectable maribou robe and a wrist-watch, to keep her from borrowing his. And a box into which he'd carefully tucked two doll-dresses of Maureen's with a note: "These aren't the right size, but you'll find yours waiting at Howard Greer's."

Their most welcome gift was Eddie Albert. It was like old times to hear his characteristic greeting: "Wouldn't you know Wyman'd pick Christmas day to play Camille?"

Just the same, he was a different Eddie. How could he fail to be different?—just back from Tarawa, having seen what he'd seen.

Ronnie was quieter, too, after Eddie had gone. It was dusk. From their hilltop, Jane and Ronnie saw the lights go out and then come on again. Now, whenever he's at home, Ronnie goes to watch the town bloom out of darkness like something from the Arabian Nights.

Jane wanted to watch, too. So he wrapped her in blankets and pulled a big chair over to the window.

"Last Christmas it was dark," said Jane.

"Yes," he answered slowly. "And this Christmas it's better. But it won't be really Christmas again till the lights are on for those other kids like Maureen all over the earth—"

She slipped her hand into his. "Next year maybe, Ronnie?—"

"Please God," Ronnie said.

MODERN SCREEN QUIZ

It's awfully easy and more fun than a barrel of monkeys. But do keep score accurately if you want an idea of your Star Intelligence Quotient. The quiz offers three sets of clues, the first on this page, the second on page 96 and the third on page 103. If you can guess, on the first clue, the name of the actor or actress to whom it refers, score yourself 5 points. If you get it on the second clue, give yourself 4. And if you must turn to the third clue before guessing the name, score yourself 3. For your total score add up all 20 individual scores. 62 or thereabouts is average, this month. For the answers, turn to page 112, but don't look before you're finished. Peeking spoils the fun.

IT'S A BOY

of hanging around waiting for the little guy to make up his mind was a bit of a strain. And Nancy was beginning to heckle. "Do you think Santa will remember my baby brother?"

"Sure, sure," Frank said with an effort at heartiness.

Came Christmas, but no baby. "He was delayed, sweetheart," Frankie told his inquiring child. "Transportation is lousy these days." She wasn't terribly disturbed. After all, she had a doll carriage and stuff, and you can't have everything.

Mrs. Sinatra gave Frank all kinds of things, shirts, pajamas, ties, books—all tied up beautifully and sitting under the tree. For a while it looked as if he'd forgotten to get her anything, but when he couldn't bear her crestfallen face another minute, he produced his gift. A diamond bracelet consisting of one hundred stones, including four 5-carat square-cut diamonds. She just sat and looked at it for a minute with all the lights from the Christmas tree reflected in it, and then she began to cry. "It's too beautiful," she whispered damply. "And I love you so."

time stood still . . .

The time was drawing near when Frank would have to go to Hollywood for his new picture. The studio had expected him long before Christmas, but he'd stalled them off for a couple of weeks. Finally, on the 27th he could stall no longer, so he deposited his two gals at Nancy's mother's in Jersey City, and left. His publicity representative, George Evans, who's also about his closest pal, saw him off, and the admonitions at the station were something.

"Call me the second Nancy thinks things are happening," Frank told him. "Don't wait till it's all over. I want to know everything. Get her whatever she needs. Call me if she gets scared and wants me to come home. I'll come—"

"Take it easy, kid," said George. "Stop worrying. She's got a wonderful doctor, a swell family right on hand. She'll be okay. I'll take care of everything. I'll even bite my nails while she's in the delivery room."

And he would have, too, if she'd give him a chance. He called her a couple of times a day to check on how she was doing, and on January tenth, he called her about 4:30 for the usual bulletin. "Nothing doing yet," she reported glumly, and George said something joshy like, "If you don't have it soon, it'll probably have you." They hung up, and she started down to the kitchen to relay the conversation to Mama. Halfway downstairs she felt a funny twinge, and she dashed to the telephone. "This," she said triumphantly to a startled George, "is it."

George called Frank immediately, and in true expectant father tradition, Frank lost his mind. "She's going to the hospital, you say? She is? How far apart are the pains?" He held on while George called Jersey City on another line to ask her. "Eight minutes," he told him.

"Gee," said Frank, "Isn't that awful close? Well, what are you waiting for? Aren't you going over to the hospital?" George tied up a couple of loose ends at the office and then dashed for Jersey City. She'd just gone to the delivery room when he arrived, and he got on the phone to tell Frank.

"Yeah?" The Voice was hoarse with nervousness. "Well, I'll hold on."

"Listen, Pop," George told him. "It may take time. I'll call you back." At six

Germs often cause common baby skin troubles such as prickly heat, diaper rash. To protect baby, best powder is Mennen. More antiseptic! Round photos above prove it. Centers of plates contain 3 leading baby powders. In gray areas, germs thrive; but in dark band around Mennen powder (far right), germ growth has been prevented!

I WIGGLE EVEN WHEN I EAT – AND EACH WIGGLE RUBS MY SKIN! I'D BE SORE ALL OVER IF MOMMY DIDN'T USE THE POWDER THAT'S SMOOTHEST 'CAUSE IT'S "HAMMERIZED". THAT'S MENNEN POWDER.

o'clock he phoned to deliver the bombshell. "Congratulations, Sinatra, it's a boy!"

"What? A boy?" Frank dropped the phone and jumped up and down screaming. Then he got on again, breathless and subdued. "You're kidding," he said. "It's a girl, isn't it? Not that I care. I'd just as soon it was a girl. I'd rather, in fact."

"It's a boy, jerk. Practically a nine-pounder."

Frank tore around his hotel room like a maniac, yelling the news at Frank and Axel and Hank, who'd been sitting around sharing his vigil. "Jeepers, it's a boy!" he screeched at them over and over again, while George poured quarters into the hospital telephone.

Finally he got on the wire again and rasped, "How's Nancy?"

"Fine; just swell."

"Will you have three dozen red roses right by her bed when she wakes up?"

"Sure. What'll I say on the card?"

JOEY WRITES FROM ITALY

My brother is in Italy now, after a journey through England, Scotland, Ireland, Tunisia, Panteleria and Sicily. This is what he writes:

"Dear Harriet,

It wasn't until recently that I came to realize the things we take most for granted are our most effective weapons. White bread is our greatest ally. The people in this war-torn place haven't had it in at least three years. They sit around the table and look at it. The minister comes and blesses it. Finally, the father takes a bit and tastes it, then gives a morsel to the family. It must last. The bread is then placed under a glass where everyone—even the neighbors—can come and look. We are slowly supplying their needs, but it takes time—a long time. I read your plan about saving more than 10% of your allowance for War Bonds, and I think it's a grand idea. You see, Harriet, soldiers have to buy Bonds and fight also. Tell this to your friends. Tell them my buddies get awfully homesick, and I do, too, sometimes. Don't tell Mother because I don't want her to worry. So buy Bonds and Stamps. I can't stress to you how much 10c more means to a soldier who needs just one more bullet. So long, Sis, and take care of Mother.

Love,
Joey"

Frankie tried to toss it off casually, but you could see he'd been working on the wording for weeks. "Say 'Congratulations to you, darling, and to the little guy, for picking himself such a wonderful mom. All my love—' "

About 45 minutes later, Frank called the hospital for a late bulletin, and whose cheery voice did he get but the little mother's. "How do you feel, sweetheart?" she asked him.

"Me? I'm perfect. Wonderful. But you, Mom, are you doing okay?"

"I'm doing fine."

"How's my boy?"

"He's beautiful, Frank. He isn't even red. And he's got sort of blond curls."

"Gee, I'm lonesome. I'm coming home."

"Don't be goony. I get along without you very well." But she was lying in her teeth, and when she'd said good-by she cried and cried.

All her sisters came to see her, Jewel and Tina, Aida and Madeline and Lillian, and her brother, too. Not to mention her parents and Frank's. All beaming at her. All making her feel like the queen bee. And it was fun to be so important, but when they'd gone home, it was lonesomer than ever. She asked the nurse to turn Frank's picture around so she could see it better. Then she looked and looked at it until she fell asleep.

melancholy moma . . .

The next day, there were the photographers, and Nancy smiled and looked light-hearted, and nobody dreamed how blue she was because her guy wasn't around.

"I'd rather have him right here," she told Aida, "with a couple of bucks in his pocket, than out there with a couple of thousand."

"Cheer up, Nance. He won't be away very long." Nancy managed a grin, but it wasn't too good.

There were long confabs outside her door on how to go about raising her morale. "Be funny, George," Tina would tell George Evans. "Be a scream," and George would go in and be very, very quiet. Once he attempted a quip.

"Gosh, Nancy," he said, "When I saw you the night the baby was born, you looked as if you'd just been given birth to. What did they do to your hair?"

She obviously didn't think that was very funny. "They didn't do anything to it. I'd washed it that afternoon, and it was up in a net."

"Oh." Well, that was that. "I can't cheer her up," he told Tina, when they were going down in the elevator.

It remained for Miss Sweeney to do that. On the third night, she became Nancy's regular nurse, and from that day forward, the big room at the end of the sixth floor corridor was literally jumping. The other nurses had been kind of awe-struck by it all. Not so, Miss Sweeney. She was a Bing Crosby fan herself and completely unimpressed. Nancy loved her from the first minute she saw her, and it was mutual. By Thursday they were calling each other Nancy and Sweeney and howling at each other's wit.

When visitors wanted to see Nancy's array of nighties and bedjackets, Sweeney would first trot out the hideous hospital number, white cotton sans frills. "This," she'd say with a deadpan, "is her flashiest job. For press interviews and stuff."

Everyone that came oh'd and ah'd about how quickly the baby had been born. "How come?" they'd say. "That," said Nancy, "is because I'm a goo-ood woman." And Sweeney fixing flowers primly in one corner of the room would guffaw. "Ignore her," Nancy would say. "She has these seizures."

They entertained each other royally, and it got so Nancy resented visitors because they were never as much fun as Sweeney.

hospital bulletin . . .

Nancy Sandra telephoned every morning, furious that children weren't admitted to the maternity floor, insatiably curious about her brother. "Can he talk? Can he laugh? Did he ask for me?"

Frank called twice a day, at which points Sweeney would bow out discreetly, making lovelorn faces as she went. Nine times out of ten when she came back, her charge was bawling. "Like I said," she'd say, "that Sinatra guy is poison." But she'd rally round with the Kleenex and the mirror and the powder puff. And make with the latest dirt about the kids.

The kids, Frankie's fans, came in droves. No one knew how they got in as the stairs were supposedly guarded, and the elevator operators weren't supposed to let them up. "I think they get here by slingshot," said Miss Sweeney. They all wanted show up quickly in these "Danger Zones" of your skin!

Read how my 4-Purpose Face Cream keeps your skin crystal-clean and fresh—and guards against these skin troubles.

No one needs to tell you that there are "danger zones" of the skin. You know! For your own mirror has warned you about them, many times.

You know, for example. that the curve next to your nose—the tiny valleys of your chin—are two zones that must be watched. For there's where skin troubles get their start, and make swift headway.

In the curve beside your nose, pores often become bigger and bigger — until they look conspicuous and coarse. Around your mouth and chin, dirt and grease tend to accumulate and harden into blackheads.

But you can be sure you won't have any of these skin troubles, if you use Lady Esther 4-Purpose Face Cream! For it guards these two danger zones, guards all the danger zones of your skin!

Each time you apply Lady Esther Face Cream it does these 4 vital things: (1) It thoroughly cleans your skin. (2) It softens your skin, loosens and absorbs the dry, clinging flakes. (3) It helps nature refine the pores. (4) It leaves a smooth perfect base for powder.

Living Proof—In Your Own Mirror! Why choose a face cream because it's expensive, or because of a clever package? Judge it only by what it does for your skin!

That's why I say—try Lady Esther 4-Purpose Face Cream! Get the smallest size jar if you like—but try it! When you see how radiantly clean and fresh your skin looks after the very first application—when you see how much smoother and more youthful it appears—it's time enough to get the largest and most economical size. But for living proof this is the most beautifying cream you have ever used, get the small-size jar today!

The story of a wife who longed for love . . . the story of a husband who longed to give it . . . A story that will help you understand many a marriage failure!

JANE watched her handsome husband, in his lieutenant's uniform, disappear through the gates of Track 7. Her brave smile vanished as the ache in her heart became unbearable.

Saying goodbye to Tom always meant a heartache, but this time the pain was far greater. Something had spoiled their precious reunion . . . something she couldn't understand. He seemed almost glad to be leaving her . . . he was so aloof and silent . . .

DOCTORS KNOW that too many women still do not have up-to-date information about certain physical facts. And too many who think they know have only half-knowledge. So they still rely on ineffective or dangerous preparations.

You have a right to know about the important medical advances made during recent years in connection with this intimate problem. They affect every woman's health and happiness.

And so, with the cooperation of doctors who specialize in women's medical problems, the makers of Zonite have just published an authoritative new book, which clearly explains the facts. (See free book offer below.)

YOU SHOULD, however, be warned here about two definite threats to happiness. First, the danger of infection present every day in every woman's life. Second, the most serious deodorization problem any woman has . . . one which you may not suspect. And what to use is so important. That's why you ought to know about Zonite Antiseptic.

USED IN THE DOUCHE (as well as for a simple every-day routine of external protection) Zonite is both antiseptic and deodorant. Zonite deodorizes, not by just masking, but by actually destroying odors. Leaves no lasting odor of its own.

Zonite also kills immediately all germs and bacteria on contact. Yet contains no poisons or acids. No other type of liquid antiseptic-germicide is more powerful, yet so safe. Your druggist has Zonite.

"DEAR BILL . . ."

It's funny the way you go along thinking you've a pretty good idea of the Red Cross and its workings. And then suddenly you find you only know the half of it. The Red Cross is not fighting one war. It's fighting two—the one you know about and the one called Disaster Relief. It means just what it says. Relief in time of disaster . . . fires, accidents, tornadoes, epidemics. This service doesn't conduct itself. It's conducted by people like you and your mom and the nice, noisy family downstairs. People who give their time to canteen work or the Motor Corps, or Nurses Aiding. What MODERN SCREEN asks you to do is stop by at your local Red Cross and find out where you fit in. Wouldn't it be a thing to be able to write your Bill in Italy, "Darling, I'm now in the Red Cross Motor Corps." Can't you just see him crowing to the other guys about it?

to see the baby, and if they were cute, shy kids, Miss S. obliged. If they were heckly, she disposed of them with a look.

Every day, Mr. Evans would come over with a bunch of mail that had arrived at the office. Letters from Eddie Cantor and Toots Shor and Michele Morgan. Letters and packages from the fans. Baby books; silver spoons; tiny sweaters. He'd also bring news on the nurse and diaper situations, usually bad.

"George," Nancy beamed at him, "you think of everything."

"Don't think I don't," he said. "Here's a bunting to take the kid home in, and here's the cap you left at your mother's." He handed her the infinitesimal woolly cap. "Not that that thing will ever get on the big lug's head. That guy's a strapper."

"Stand-in father," said Sweeney. "Even has delusions of grandeur about the child's size."

"Well, he is big," Nancy said a trifle huffily. "He looks about two months old."

So the days passed, and finally January 20th, going-home day, arrived. Sweeney packed Nancy's bag. The lush bedjackets, the nail polish, the perfume, the book she'd brought but hadn't had a chance to read. Before she put in Frankie's picture she gave it a kiss. "Uh-uh, Sweeney, Crosby could get you for infidelity." That was Nancy.

"I've decided," Miss Sweeney said, "that my heart is big enough for two." She'd kind of fallen for the gent listening to his Vimms program the night he sang "Oh What a Beautiful Morning," and stuck in "Nancy is feeling okay" instead of "Everything's going my way." She'd thought that was terribly cute, though she hadn't confessed it to Nancy. Sweeney wasn't much for drool.

At last everything was packed. The baby was dressed, and Nancy was ensconced in the wheel chair looking darling in a brown gabardine suit that was the twin to one of Frank's. The new nurse was on hand, and George, and swarms of people. Sweeney waved them onto the elevator, then watched the door close with a funny lump in her throat. She went to the window and saw them get into the car.

"Bye, Butch," she said out loud to the tiny man in the blue bunting. "Hope you're as nice as your mom and your old man. . . ."

Than which she couldn't wish him anything sweller.

"LADY IN THE DARK"

PRODUCTION

Specialists in the art and paint departments were assigned to paint faces on 180 three-foot eggs. Care had to be taken to get exactly the right degree of mobility in the egg-head's expressions because they had to turn and twist and appear to be watching the action. Special prize went to the artist who turned out his egg-face with a leer, for Ginger Rogers' semi-strip tease number.

Ginger's gown in this number was the fabulous mink-and-sequin creation Edith Head designed for her. She couldn't enjoy wearing it, because she had to do her dance on a coco-matting covering the circus ring, and something in the atmospheric conditions caused electrical charges to sweep through the fur into Ginger!

The sets are the work of Designer Raoul Du Bois, who drew hundreds of color sketches. Luis Vance was assigned to execute them practically, and he reports that to make dreams photograph-able takes the combined efforts of some 17 studio departments. Du Bois uses French poster paint for his sketches, which isn't easy to match with American dyes. So that was the first headache. Next, all, every inch, of material used had to be flame-proofed because Technicolor arc lights often throw dangerous carbon sparks.

In the dance scene with Don Loper, Ginger had to be shown apparently floating on clouds, so the boys dreamed up a "cloud cooker," a contraption that creates carbon dioxide by blowing steam through dry ice immersed in hot water. For clouds higher up, Britt guns were used. These machines spray white smoke-producing chemicals in the air. To clear the air between scenes, mammoth vacuum cleaners were constructed. The hoses on these sweepers were nearly 100 feet long, 5 feet wide and had a 35-foot nozzle made of wood connected to air-conditioning equipment. Seems smoke gets in the Technicolor camera's eyes, unless this is done often.

Ginger wore a wig in this particular number that had to be glued to her head, then pinned. Then the bangs were sewed on with needle and thread! This was necessary to keep her hair in place during the strenuous dance routine.

The limit of $5000 on any new material for a set stymied the producers at one point. They thought the set had been completed, but when everything was checked, a complete backdrop was still to be built. Paint for it would have cost $600 more. There is no priority on labor, however, so it cost the studio $2500 extra to hire four women to work days appliqueing velvet and satin on the huge wooden expanse!

Ginger worked approximately 84 days out of an 89-day shooting schedule, in addition to three weeks of dance rehearsals before camera work began. Of her five days off, three were a honeymoon with Marine John Calvin Briggs, now overseas.

spangled milland . . .

Ray Milland blushed bright red the day he saw his costume for the circus sequence. The coat and top hat were made of red, blue and purple sequins in a sunflower pattern, the breeches were pure white, and his boots were constructed of red suede. The days he had to wear the outfit, he used to sneak back and forth from his dressing room to the set enveloped in a great ankle length polo coat.

SINCE THEY WENT AWAY

Jack was studying at Stanford University.

They were always so much older, it was almost like having three dads looking after her. Only of course the boys were her brothers, so she didn't have to mind them as much as she minded Daddy. One of the earliest things she remembers is getting all three of them down on the floor to be her horses. She'd ride on the middle one, and the other two would gallop alongside.

bringing up shirley . . .

Jack was really the one who took care of her. So they tell her, anyway. Naturally, she doesn't remember. But she can well believe it, because Jack worries a lot, he takes life more seriously than George. For instance, when Shirley first started working, and Mom had to go to the studio with her, and they didn't have any help, it was pretty hard on Mom, who'd be up till 12 sometimes, fixing carrots and spinach for dinner next day. So the boys were supposed to help with the housework. Well, Jack always did, while George had a cute little habit of disappearing into empty space like the vanishing lady. Being younger might have had something to do with it, but not much. George just never worries; he laughs. That's where Shirley's lucky again. Two worrying brothers or two laughing brothers might get monotonous. One of each is just right.

When she was a baby, Mom and Daddy'd want to go out together once in a while, so they'd have a woman in to look after Shirley. Till Jack said, "I'm almost 15, Mom. I can do it better." So they let him. Well, one night they came home, and Shirley was asleep, and here was Jack sitting by the crib in Mom's robe. They must have looked pretty astonished—you can hardly blame them—but Jack never gave it a second thought.

"Oh, I forgot to take it off," he said.

"What did you ever put it on for in the first place?" Dad asked.

"Because I always put it on when she cries. Then she thinks I'm Mom and shuts up."

There wasn't much squabbling round the house. The boys wouldn't deign to squabble with her; they put her in her place. When Jack got mad at her, he'd call her La Temple. On account of being in the movies, he'd keep on the watch to see that she didn't get bratty or show off. "Mom," he'd growl, "you going to let her get away with that?" At first she couldn't understand what the movies had to do with it. She didn't know actresses were supposed to be more conceited than other people. Herself, she thinks that's pretty silly. She doesn't like show-offs any better than Jack does.

The only trouble she had with George was over the funnies. Or maybe she ought to come clean and say the only trouble George had with her. Because she used to hide them. George would turn the house upside down, then she'd hear him in Mom's room. "Mom, where are the funnies?"

"Shirley has them."

Then, to be ready for emergencies, she'd start racking her brain, trying to remember where she'd put them. But when Shirley hid the funnies, they'd stay hid. Half the time she couldn't find them herself.

The boys never call her anything but Shirley—not even Shirl, the way Mom does sometimes. Jack is short for John Stanley, and they call George Sonny. Which must sound pretty funny now to other people, because he's six foot one and weighs 220. On the subject of Sonny's height, there's a one-inch difference of opinion between Mom and Shirley. Mom calls him a straight six, but Shirley insists on the extra inch. Next time he comes home from Mojave, where he's stationed right now, she plans to measure him.

There's no argument about how tall Jack is; he's six foot four, but built on slightly less colossal lines than George. He's a sergeant in the Army Air Corps, and George is master tech sergeant in the Marine Air Corps—she thinks that's equal to chief petty officer in the Navy. He's the best-looking thing you ever set eyes on. She'd call him the all-American boy, except she has an idea it might not hit him just right. Jack's awf'ly goodlooking, too, but in a different way. He's the intellectual type, kind of dreamy-eyed and sensitive like Jimmy Stewart. Shirley's more like George, easy-going and rather obstinate. She thinks she's obstinate anyway. She asked Mom once, and Mom gave her that dry look and said, "Let's call it independent, darling." So she guesses she's obstinate, like George.

Then in other ways she has lots in common with Jack. He talks to her about books, and it's on account of Jack that she got to love music so much. He's mad about it, simply mad. He used to send her records from Stanford and told her he could always study better when he had a symphony going in the background, and why didn't she try it? Now she can't do her lessons unless the radio's on. It's not always symphony music, as Mom points out on various occasions, but is it Shirley's fault if the symphony goes off and Inner Sanctum comes on?

Jack plays bridge and gin rummy with her—and she has to admit, if you ask, that she beats him quite often. Card games are too settled for George, he's up and away. Jack's the home-loving one. George doesn't spend much time at home, but he likes to know it's there. If they're all not around when he gets in, he's very upset. He used to keep writing from Hawaii that he wanted to come home and find everything the way he left it.

The most important thing that happened to Jack was getting married. The most important thing that happened to George was Pearl Harbor. And that's another thing that shows how different they are. Jack told Mom and Dad he was going to elope. George just went ahead and enlisted.

Really what Jack did was elope with permission. He'd been going with Mims quite a while—her real name is Miriam, but they call her Mims, and she's just darling. Anyway, Jack phoned one night and said they'd like to get married without any fuss, and was it all right with Mom and Dad? Mom told Dad, and Dad said, "Sure, tell them to go ahead," so they did. . . .

The only one that really got gypped was Shirley. Ever since she was little, she wanted to be a flower girl at her brother's wedding. Maybe it was just as well though. She was 13 at the time and really too old for a flower girl. Maybe when George gets married, they'll be kind enough to let her be a bridesmaid. She loves church weddings and everything that goes with them, like having your engagement announced by your Mom and Dad. That's how she wants it if she ever decides to get married. Not that she has any plans, almost-16 still being a little young. . . .

It was way before the war when George enlisted. He didn't come home one night, and Mom was a little worried but not much, because sometimes he'd stay overnight with a boy friend and forget to phone. Then Dad called from the office and asked Mom if she'd seen the papers, and Mom hadn't.

Dad said, "Your son's in the Marines." Well, that was pretty exciting, and he

How to help give your face and neck this QUICK 'BEAUTY-LIFT'

Helps Skin Appear Smoother, Firmer, More BABY-FRESH With Each Application!

Have you ever sighed, "Oh I wish someone would give me a new face!" Well—that's quite impossible unless you resort to drastic measures like plastic surgery.

But there is a very simple method (takes only 8 minutes a day) whereby you can help make your skin appear remarkably satin-smooth, radiant, firmer and more baby-fresh with each application—a famous method which should help you maintain perfectly enchanting face and throat beauty thruout the years—as it has already for so many lovely girls and women—

AND HERE IT IS!

Briskly pat Edna Wallace Hopper's Facial Cream over your face and throat, always using upward, outward strokes (see diagram). Gently press an extra amount of Hopper's Cream over any lines or wrinkles. Leave on for about 8 minutes. Then wipe off.

Just see how caressingly soft, smooth and glowing your skin appears. The reason Hopper's Facial Cream is so active and it so expertly lubricates the skin is that it's homogenized.

Faithful use helps you maintain truly dazzling face and throat beauty thruout the years. Hopper's Facial Cream is also a marvelous powder base. At all cosmetic counters.

Another Great Beauty Aid

Hopper's White Clay Pack is marvelous as a "quick beauty pick up"—makes you look ravishingly lovely on short notice. Wonderful for blackheads and enlarged pore openings. It also helps clear away faded "top-skin" debris with its ugly dried up skin cells which make any girl look much older.

looked simply super in his uniform, and then he was sent to Hawaii, which was all right, too—better than some other place, because Hawaii was almost like a second home to Shirley. She'd been there three times and she just adored it. George sent her a darling little Marine pin with pearls around it, and he wrote to her an awful lot. It was funny. At home Jack expressed himself more, George was always quiet. But he certainly expressed himself in his letters. She never knew he liked her as well as he did till he started writing. . . .

happy tears . . .

Then, that Sunday she was down at the pool, and she saw Mom coming and she knew right away from her face that something dreadful had happened. First Mom and Dad thought they'd try to keep it from her, on account of George. But you can't keep anything as important as a war from people when they're 13. So they told her the Japs had attacked Pearl Harbor.

Shirley's not much of a weeper. When things happen, she goes off and wrestles with them by herself. Mom says she's calm on the surface—that's the Dutch in her—but seethes like a pool underneath. This time she didn't go off by herself, she wanted to stick close to Mom and Dad. For a while she couldn't say anything, then she broke down and really cried. It was nothing she could help, it took hold of her like something outside herself, and she thought she'd never be able to stop. . . .

She doesn't like to think of the days that followed, when they didn't know about George. She'd rather think of two days before Christmas, when the news came that he was safe. It was merry and unmerry Christmas all mixed up together—unmerry on account of the war, but very merry for the Temple family on account of George.

About six months later they talked to him on the phone. The call didn't come through till one at night, but Mom promised to wake Shirley up, and did. George was frightened because he thought something had happened to them, and by the time they got him calmed down, you couldn't say much but hello, how are you, good-by. Except George asked her how tall she was, and he thought she said five foot eight, and he kept saying, "You can't be!" and he was perfectly right, you can't be five eight when you're only five and half an inch. It was all pretty confusing, but simply miraculous just to hear his voice.

That was nothing, though, compared with when he came home. Shirley's told you Modern Screen readers how she was sitting in the car, waiting for Mom who was shopping, and how George stuck his head through the window, and first she was stunned and then she started to bawl. Then Mom came and all they could do, driving up Wilshire, was hold George's hand and cry. They stopped in at Westlake because she wanted Miss Mills to see him—Miss Mills is the head of Westlake School. The girls were all buzzing around, and Shirley was pretty proud of her brother, but in Miss Mills' office, she started crying all over again. . . . That was the cryingest day—

Then they went home, and George had to see every inch of the house and garden, and he noticed every little change, like, "This radio wasn't here before" and "That's a new picture of Shirley." He told them about Pearl Harbor, how he'd been to a wedding the night before, and all the other boys were sleeping out in tents that morning, he was the only one in barracks, and someone came in and said, "The Japs are attacking," and he thought it was a gag and said, "Oh, go away—" Then he heard the sounds. But he wouldn't tell any more after that—anyway, not Shirley, though she has a deep suspicion he told Mom and Dad and Jack. . . .

All she wanted to do was look at him. He looked older and more serious to her at first, but not any more—and she guesses she looked all right to him. Now he gets in about once a week from Mojave, and she says hello to him and that's about all she sees of him; he's off with his gang. When her friends are around, he's very nice to them, he just doesn't pay any attention to them at all, especially girls. They don't mind though; they know he's an older man.

Jack's been in the Army Air Corps a year now. First he was stationed at Palo Alto. That's where the baby was born. They wanted a girl, but Shirley told them a long time ago it would be a boy, because most first babies are boys. She had a name all picked out for him, too—Dwight, after Eisenhower—but before she had a chance to tell them, the baby was suddenly John Stanley Junior. That's because Mims was so disappointed, she turned her head away and said, "Oh, just call him after his father." Now she can't stand it to think she was disappointed even for a second, so she loves him twice as hard.

Shirley got the usual thrill out of being an aunt. She didn't see the baby till he was two and a half months, when Jack was transferred to Culver City. He looks like a professor and, having such an intellectual father, she expected him to walk and talk like a fiend, but all he did was blow bubbles. . . .

Jack and Mims bring him over weekends. You can't do much with him yet because he goes to sleep a lot—just tickle him gently, or hold him for a while and put him down again. They call him Johnny for the present. Later on he'll be Stanley, which sounds more adult.

I SAW IT HAPPEN

About two years ago Warner Bros. were filming "Flight Angel" at an airport right behind our high school. We kids naturally hounded the field for autographs. After we'd gotten all the important ones, we noticed a good-looking young man in grease paint and asked him for his. He laughed and said, "Oh, I'm nobody," but we thought maybe some day he would be. And that some day came sooner than we expected, for the young actor is John Ridgely, star of Warners' "Air Force."

closed corporation . . .

Shirley thinks it's quite a coincidence that the picture she's in now for Mr. David O. Selznick is called "Since You Went Away." Because she thinks she can understand it better since the boys were away and came back again. She doesn't know if she can explain it, not being very good at analyzing, but—if you're sad or happy, it makes the sadness easier and the happiness more so, with people you love around. For instance, she thought she couldn't bear it when Chingie died. (Ching is the Peke who's been her beloved playmate for years.) But when George put his arm around her and Jack said, "I'm sorry, sis," it somehow helped the hurt. . . .

And for happiness—well, she was having a very good time one night at the Riviera Country Club when her two brothers walked in. And she danced with them both and didn't tell anyone they were her brothers, and everyone thought, "Well, now, who's that fine-looking soldier and that handsome Marine?" So the dance was twice as much fun.

Christmas was twice as much fun, too. Jack gave her the score of "Showboat" and some lovely gardenias, and George gave her a pair of Marine wings. And it's fun if they're there when she comes down dressed for a dance, and they like her dress. She can always tell, because George goes "Whew-whew!" and Jack says, "Gosh, that's sump'n!" She doesn't even mind when they tease her about boys—all big brothers do.

Sometimes she thinks it's not so wonderful for brothers to have a sister in the movies. As if it were their fault. Not that she thinks they'd want to change her for anyone, she's not that silly. But Jack—he's a whiz of a technician and all steamed up about television—Jack took lots of ribbing when he worked at the studio. He doesn't even know she knows, but you kind of catch on to things.

And when Sonny first went to camp, the other boys said, "Just wait till he gets here, we'll take him apart." A friend of Sonny's who was there told Mom about it. And this friend said, "Have you ever seen Shirley's brother?" And they all said no. And he said, "Okay, wait till you see him." And they said it was very funny how they seemed to forget about taking him apart when they saw how big he was.

Except one corporal who saw him doing k.p. "Not much like home, is it, Temple?" And George went kind of grim and said, "What anyone else around here can take, I can take." He can, too. And more. They both can.

You don't have to ask Shirley what she thinks of her brothers. It shines out all over her. But she doesn't mind telling you either. "Whew-whew!" she thinks, in a treble imitation of Sonny's best whistle. "My brothers are sump'n!"

CUBA

Xavier Cugat, assisted by the wife of the drummer in his band, prepares a wine-flavored specialty in the kitchen of the Maxie Rosenbloom house which he rented in Hollywood.

"Ah-h," says the Rumba King as he samples this dish. He stars next in M-G-M's "Mr. Co-Ed," "Two Sisters and a Sailor."

SI, si-si-si, SI, si-si-si! To the softly throbbing strains of a rumba, punctuated by the staccato sound of the maracas, we continue our culinary tour of the Caribbean by taking an imaginary trip to Cuba—only a short plane ride from the Dominican Republic which we visited last month with Maria Montez.

Our guide to this "Holiday Isle of the Tropics" is—as you can see—none other than the Rumba King, Xavier Cugat. Cugat, the colorful orchestra leader whose Latin American rhythms survived with equal success the crazes for swing and sweet—to stand out in the dance world as a beacon pointing to our good neighbors to the South.

Cugat, the cartoonist, whose clever and often devastating black and white sketches of famous folk are regularly distributed all over the country by King Features. (His drawing talents, by the way, were originally developed under the encouraging eye of a fellow-cartoonist—the opera star, Enrico Caruso!)

Cugat, the movie actor, by virtue of the fact that—surprisingly enough—he turned out to be, on the screen, a comedian as well as a baton wielder! Cugat, the Spanish born American citizen, whose early childhood years were spent in Cuba—which country bestowed upon him its highest decoration, The Grand Cross, ". . . for promoting good will between Cuba and the United States through popularizing Cuban music . . ." Which is still another link in the historic chain that binds our two countries together.

Cugat, the versatile, who here steps into our own particular spotlight as a connoisseur of Cuban foods. Which in his eyes, as well as ours, is no mean achievement in itself!

"In Cuba, where I spent fourteen years of my childhood and early youth, I learned to look upon food as a verrry important subject," Coogie started our interview by declaring with conviction. "Why, Havana," he went on, "between the hours of one and three is a 'dead city' because its citizens invariably take two hours for lunch—crowding all means of transportation to return to their respective homes for this important mid-day meal, which is followed by a short siesta. This daily 'intermission' is a habit I should hate to see them give up in favor of the weighty business discussions and the drug-store-snacks-eaten-on-the-run which we go in for in this country.

"Cuban dishes," continued Mr. Cugat, obviously warming to his subject, "are very simple. The fact that they are also very bland and not at all rich may surprise many people! This is because foreigners are familiar only with the dishes that are served them. But these are 'exhibition' dishes and, like 'exhibition' dances, are not meant for ordinary use but are reserved for special occasions only. Why, if the natives were to eat that way every day it would ruin their digestion!

"Among the foods that Cubans enjoy and eat constantly are such essentially simple things are Frijoles Negros (Black Beans) prepared with a tasty sauce; and Arroz Blanco which is nothing more than White Rice, cooked really well, for a welcome change from the soggy grey mass that one so frequently encounters elsewhere. Then there's Picadillo which you can translate into Hash, if you must—although so plebeian a name scarcely does it justice. And we mustn't omit one of my favorites—of Spanish origin as are so many Cuban favorites—Bacalao à la Viscaina. It's made of salt codfish—of all things, in a country famous for its fresh seafood!

"It may also surprise you to learn," went on Mr. Cugat (who surprised us even more by sketching away madly while he was being interviewed!) "that probably 99 percent of all Cuban men are excellent cooks. This is doubtless because they have such high regard for the pleasures of the palate. I, for example, take pride in making Sufrito." (Our photographer caught Mr. Cugat in the very act of adding a little wine to this specialty of his, which combines chick peas with ham and other interesting items.) "While my friend, Roberto Hernandez, the Cuban Consul General in New York, is famous among gourmets for his Fricase de Pollo. You must ask him to give you the recipe, because readers of MODERN SCREEN will find this particular dish a far cry from the anemic Chicken Fricassee that is served in so many American homes."

Well, Senor Hernandez did give us the recipe. And, at the same time, he made the helpful suggestion that we get in touch with New York's Havana-Madrid, noted as the most authentic of the Cuban-Spanish clubs in North America, and ask them for further information on Cuban foods.

Well, we did! And as a result we secured from Anatole Pujol, the capable chef of that famous restaurant, directions for making the very dishes we had discussed with Mr. Cugat. Thanks, therefore, to this all-Cuban team we have a prize collection of easy-to-follow recipes to offer in this month's attractive little leaflet, which will make Cuban Cooking à la Cugat a pleasure as well as a novelty for us all.

They sound like Latin-American song titles—these Cuban dishes that Cugat recommends: Bacalao à la Viscaina, Picadilla, Arroz Blanco, Frijoles Negros, Sufrito and Fricase de Pollo. But they're practical, too. And the coupon will bring a leaflet telling you how to prepare them.

the real McCoy. Talent was bred in his bones. The sunny spunk and spirit, the never-flagging fight of show people has raced in his blood from babyhood on to this day. His crib was a scarred theatrical suitcase propped on a dressing room shelf. His lullaby was the brassy slur of a pit band slide trombone.

Effie Crane was a Decatur, Illinois, girl of French-Irish blood, who shook the dust of that town from her tiny feet when she was five years old. She ran off then with a visiting stock company and never came back. When she was 14 and a veteran of the boards, she joined a show in a small Pennsylvania town and met a husky, hearty Irishman named "Chuck" Connors. John O'Connor he called himself. He was from County Cork, begorra, the son of a rock-muscled miner, and like Effie, he had skipped out young to join a wagon show and come to America. Because he was strong and quick and fearless, he learned to be an acrobat and circus strong man when he wasn't socking leather as a prizefighter or swatting horse-hide as a pro-baseballer in the Three-I league. Chuck had a tumbling act when Effie laid eyes on him, and the minute she did, she fell in love.

sawdust circuit . . .

He was 24 then, ten years older, but that didn't make any difference. They were married, and Chuck broke in his 14-year-old wife as his acrobatic partner. They traveled with circuses after that—Hagenback-Wallace and the Ringling Brothers, and off season they'd join up with tent shows, pitch shows, five-a-day vaudeville, traveling tank town stock or "what am I offered?" Effie played an ingenue in corn belt dramas like "The Two Orphans," sang and danced as a soubrette in burly-Q, or flew through the air with the greatest of ease, in pink tights and spangles, over the center ring. Along the way she collected a family, every member of whom, as soon as they could walk, joined whatever act Effie and Chuck were working. The Crane Family they called it for a while, then the O'Connor Family fastened on, and later they got fancy and billed themselves "The Royal Family of Vaudeville."

his wife Effie had had six children. Three were dead, but three survived; Jack, the eldest, then 19, Billy, 12, and Arlene, 5. And in Chicago in a modest theatrical hotel her seventh and last baby was born.

Effie O'Connor was alone. That didn't strike her as unusual. Nor the fact that up until a couple of weeks ago she had played every night in the act. The O'Connor family was booked for small town fairs at little Illinois towns around Chicago. That's where they were now, singing and hoofing and joking and doing acrobatics while she lay and looked out into the dingy dusk of the big city, and occasionally gripped the side of the bed with pain. But that's what happened to show people; they were a separate breed, Effie O'Connor thought—born to keep people laughing.

A woman from the next room poked her head inside and asked, "How are you feeling?" She saw the path of pain that crossed Effie O'Connor's face, and not waiting for an answer she said, "I'll get Martha tucked in bed, and then I'll stick in here with you." The woman's name was Peggy Reed, and the daughter she tucked in was to grow up and become Martha Raye.

It was three o'clock in the morning when she called a taxi. An hour later at four A.M. the baby was born at St. Elizabeth's Hospital. Peggy Reed stayed there all night at the bedside, and in the morning when Effie opened her eyes, she said, "He's a fine boy. And his name's Donald O'Connor."

"Who said so?" whispered Effie weakly.

"Me. I've always liked the name Donald. And this one seems just like my own boy."

sound as a watch . . .

Donnie, as his family called him, did grow fast, although the more eminent pediatricians would hardly prescribe the formula and routine he got to grow on. He was a funny little kid, with snow white fuzz on his skull and snow white eyebrows and lashes, like an albino. He had the same gray laughing eyes of his Irish dad and a wide, mischievous mouth. He wasn't big, but from the start he was sturdy and sound as a dollar watch. He had a voice, too, like a cavalry bugle's blast. Effie O'Connor's biggest problem of the day was to get Donnie to sleep backstage in time for her to go on with the act. Usually she succeeded, but the trouble was Donnie didn't always stay asleep. More than once, in the middle of her tumbling, she would see the theater manager out of the corner of her eyes—standing in the wings, dancing anxiously on one foot and then the other. "P-ss-ss-t!" he'd stage whisper, "Hurry and wind up the act, Mrs. O'Connor, and come take care of your baby!"

They traveled around plenty then, these vaudeville vagabonds, the O'Connors. Trouping was their life, and six children had had to face it and three had survived. Little Donald, like the rest, shared the family's good breaks and bad luck from the minute he was born, it's soft touches and it's hardships. Early in life Don O'Connor found he could take it.

John O'Connor had rigged up an old Reo Speedwagon for the family to tour in. It had bunks and lockers, lanterns, tables, a tiny stove, blankets, cupboards and even closets. That was the first home Donald O'Connor knew. In his infant memory the world jounced and rumbled by and curious people looked inside. The kaleidoscope of his baby mind whirred with images of gas flares and clowns and hoochy ladies and red show banners with gilt lettering. With long all-night trips between towns, and dawn breaking through the dusty windows of the Reo as it parked beside a country road, busted down, or out of gas or just stopped for the night because a hotel was too far away or it wouldn't take in "show people." Or because John O'Connor and his wife were temporarily "out of funds."

One time when he was a tiny tot, the gypsy-like O'Connors were headed across the Northern prairies hastening to meet a booking in a Wisconsin town. The sky was tattletale gray, and it turned swiftly to downright black. A snowstorm sifted down on them, and the flakes were whirling fast. Effie wanted to turn back, but Jack, always confident, and not to have his Irish bluffed by any storm, kept driving on. Little Donnie swung from his hammock rolled in wool blankets. The snowstorm turned to a blizzard, though, and the thermometer plummeted. The road piled high with blinding scooting flakes, and the Reo ran up to its radiator in a drift. The O'Connors bugged each other to keep from freezing and took turns holding the shivering little Donnie inside their coats. There wasn't anything to do, and it looked like a tragic headline for the morning paper in Milwaukee.

Then they heard a strange whirring, sucking sound, and a snow plow broke through the drifts on the road ahead of them. Two giant men, swathed in mufflers and bearskin coats leaped down, with icicles in their whiskers. They came up to the Reo, peered in and saw Effie huddling her brood.

"Lady," exploded one, "what the hell are you doing with them kids out in this blizzard?"

Jack popped his big Irish head out. He explained they had to make it to So-and-So. It was their living. The family went as one, and if one made it, all did—or vice-versa. But the man still boiled. "You ought to be in jail!" he raged. "Don't you know you might have frozen them kids? Say," he said, "what's your name, anyway?" The tone suggested he was all set to run them into the local law.

"O'Connor."

"Huh?" said the man. He breathed deep. Then he turned to his partner in the snowplow cab.

"Hey, Finnegan!" he yelled. "Come on, let's get these dam' Swedes out of this snow!" So he pulled them out, took them to a train, and the O'Connors made their play date.

royal family on the rocks . . .

The law was one reason John O'Connor and his "royal family" seldom hit the Big City, New York. They played the cider circuit because New York was the home of the Gerry Society, and that was the same thing as the Big Bad Wolf to show people who used their small kids in their acts. The Gerry Society sleuths searched high and low for vaudeville folks who violated the child labor laws, and when they caught up with them, it was a big fine or a revoke of their license or worse. As a kid, to Don O'Connor the heavy of heavies was a Gerry official. He always walked furtively off the stage his first night in a strange town expecting to see the wagon backed up to the steps, ready to haul him and his folks to the cooler. Don got wise and tough and wary young in life. He had to. He was one of the men of the family—he and his big brothers Jack and Billy. Because Don doesn't remember his dad at all. When Don was hardly a year old, Effie O'Connor was left a widow.

The other O'Connor kids remembered that year of sadness well for a long time, and the tragedy of it seeped into the early awareness of Donnie.

It started, the run of bad luck, when the family tried out in New York for a booking on the big time. In the middle of the tryout Billy slipped from a handstand and snapped his arm like a matchstick. That ruined the tryout, and the engagement went glimmering. The O'Connors had staked about everything on getting that play run—even the trip to New York, which they couldn't afford, and the risk of tangling again with the Gerry Society. When it fizzled out, they found themselves broke in the big city. They didn't have a speck of work for nine weeks and not a penny to eat on. Show business friends fed the O'Connors, with the big heart that show people always have and the spare bit of emergency cash most of them keep tucked away in an old shoe or somewhere. Rescue came at last with a four week engagement at good pay. Things looked rosy.

Then tragedy struck again. And this time Donald O'Connor's brilliant future almost died aborning. He missed being killed by the merest chance.

heart-break ahead . . .

The engagement started at Hartford, Conn., at the Capitol, and things went fine for part of the first week. Then one day Arlene, six years old, took Donald out for an airing in his baby buggy. There was a candy store across the street from the Capitol, and Arlene had a sweet tooth. She started to push Don's buggy across the rough cobblestones, neighbors said, but decided it was too big a job. So she left him parked on the sidewalk and dashed across to the candy store alone.

Effie O'Connor was ironing out some of Don's baby things in her dressing room when she heard the scream and the screech of brakes. When she ran out, she found her daughter pinned under an automobile. Arlene was killed instantly.

The O'Connors went on with their engagement. They had to. More than ever now they needed the salary checks. So, right after little Arlene's funeral they sang and joked and picked up their heels on the stage as the act swung north through New England. Then one night, in Brockton, Mass., only nine weeks later, the O'Connor Family heard the band cue for their family entrance. They all trooped out on the stage. Last came John, daddy of all the O'Connors, running out, red-faced and jolly, greeting the people with a big laugh and a quick tumble to warm up the audience. But this night when he tumbled he didn't get up. He lay still, and Effie O'Connor screamed when she saw the color of his face. John O'Connor was dead at 49, mercifully quick from a heart attack.

> Full of surprises—that Don O'Connor! Up and elopes as we're going to press! But don't miss next month's big issue! Don's giving us an exclusive tell-all story!

Young Donald, still a mere infant, was too young to know about these tragedies. But he heard about them from the minute he could understand what words meant, and he always felt that he had shared in them, too. He sensed at once that the world could be rough on show business folks. In some ways it made him tough, standing up to the world, even as a tot, going after what he wanted. Even when he was barely out of diapers, Don O'Connor was known around vaudeville haunts as "the toughest little kid in show business."

Donnie walked when he was eight months old, about twice as soon as most babies. At the old Kedzie Theater in Chicago, when he was still wearing diapers, he broke loose from his dressing room pen one night when the O'Connors were on, toddled out before the lights with his "pacifier" still in his mouth. He grinned at the orchestra professor, dropped the pacifier in the pit and started stamping around on the stage to the tune of "Black Bottom," chortling, "Boom-pah-boom-pah-boom" and wiggling his little behind. From that night on he was part of the act. And his "Black Bottom" was always a riot.

Soon Donnie became the junior partner of an O'Connor Family act which had been revised, of necessity, after the tragedies of Chuck and Arlene's deaths. There was Effie, of course, and brother Jack, now a grown man, and Billy, the heavy set, merry comedy-talented brother right above Don. Jack's wife, Millie, was in the act now, too, and after a while her daughter, Patsy, Don's niece—but more like a sister to Don—would arrive to join the group.

Little Don became a tumbler the minute he dropped his diapers. Jack and Billy used to toss him around like a basketball on the stage in their acts. He was tiny, but he could take it. In fact, although Don was always short and small as a boy, he was tightly knit with a web of muscles all over him. Like his dad, Chuck, he was just naturally tough. He learned to dance early, too, and sing. One of his first successful routines was a team dance with his two brothers. He sang "Looking at the World Through Rose Colored Glasses," "My Mom" and "Keep Your Sunny Side Up," and right after he could talk, he learned how to time gags and dialogue.

When he was no more than three years old, Donnie worked in a tiny tuxedo. He was crazy about clothes in those days, as he is today. Nothing pleased him more than to strut down the street in his stage finery and watch the other kids stare in awe and admiration. Once in Lancaster, Pa., he disappeared when his mother was busy backstage. She rushed out on the streets looking for Donnie frantically, then called the police. Finally, one came back leading Don by the hand.

"Guess where I found him," grinned the cop. "Down in front of the Good Will Mission with the Salvation Army Band. The kid was singing to beat the band and dancing in this monkey suit. And the coin was rollin' in."

The normal life that normal kids led was something Don O'Connor never knew. Normal kids had houses and back yards and a home town, and they went to school. In his whole life Don O'Connor went to a real public school only twice and then for only a few months each time. His mother taught him his ABC's and his multiplication table and everything else, in between shows in her dressing room. She used a correspondence course put out by the Pennsylvania Board of Education. Effie O'Connor, among all the hundreds of things she had to do daily, held class each morning in the dressing room of whatever show house the O'Connors happened to be playing. She remembers Donnie now, poring over his lessons while the rest of the family dabbed on grease paint. He used to mix her rouge, powder, cold cream and mascara all together when she wasn't watching and paint pictures on the wall with it. He studied his lessons on the cindery seats of jerk town trains, wrote them out, and she mailed them in. He did his home work by the dim light of hotels where show people paid in advance, and they nailed down the towels.

That was the kind of childhood Donald O'Connor remembers, "turkeying" all over the country, eating at "Maw's Places" or sending out for sandwiches and milk between shows, because there wasn't time for anything else. Working one night stands and split weeks on the five-a-day—or sometimes a schedule where you did 10 and 12 shows a day and marked them off on the dressing room wall so you wouldn't forget how many performances you'd done.

endearing young charms . . .

But he thrived on it. He was never sick—if you can count out the time in St. Louis when the act right before the O'Connors had a gag that spilled mothballs all over the stage, and Don, thinking they were candy, stuffed them in his mouth. He had some accidents, too—once when he was three, and he climbed adventurously upon a prop wall backstage in a Chicago house, fell off and cracked his arm. Tiny as he was, Don had guts about those things. He never cried or folded up. The time, for instance, in Detroit, when he fell in the middle of his tumbling act and cut an artery in his arm. The way he kept on with the act, holding his arm tight with his other hand and wiping off the blood with his handkerchief until the act was over.

Don's boyhood vitality spilled over in the form of mischief. The excitement and constant change of his childhood didn't allow him the quiet luxury of toys or books or pets. Outside of the white rat a traveling entertainer gave him or the rabbits that Blackstone, the magician, bestowed as reward for help in his act, Don never owned any pets. His playground was no back yard or school ground, but the streets outside theatrical hotels or the empty rows of seats in a theater before and after shows. As a result he found ways to spill his dynamite spirits around the show house. Managers and vaudevillians soon tagged him as a terror.

short snorer . . .

But the most serious escapade occurred one night at the State-Lake Theater in Chicago where the O'Connors had a big time engagement. A man slumped in the front row of the house, sound asleep through the entire act; what's more, he snored. It was ruining the act. Everyone was laughing at the snores instead of the O'Connors, and that burnt all of them up. First Brother Billy started stamping his feet on the stage, but the man snored peacefully on. Then Jack shot off a blank pistol. But still he snored. The audience was roaring now, and the joke was on the O'Connors. Don ran off stage, sore as a boil, grabbed a bottle of seltzer water and squirted it right in the sleeper's face. He jumped up, ran out of the theater like he had been stung—and then sued the O'Connors, the theater management and everyone. It put them in a nice pickle for a while.

When Don was only seven, the O'Connors landed on a bill with a Fanchon and Marco revue of beautiful tootsies. The girls had a dressing room of their own, built of beaverboard and set apart backstage. One afternoon there was a commotion and indignant girlish outcries, and when the O'Connors investigated, they found Don in the middle of the outraged chorines getting the daylights spanked out of him.

He'd punched holes in the beaverboard walls to watch the girls change costumes! Another time they found him, dolled up in his stage outfit of cutaway coat, gray spats and cane, leaning against the wings like an old roué as the chorus tripped on the stage. As each girl skipped by, Don looked soulfully into her eyes and repeated "I love you . . . I love you . . . I love you." He was all of eight years old.

Don was just as tough with boys as he was bold with girls. Like his Irish dad, who had punched out his living in the ring, Don loved a fight, just for the fight's sake. He wasn't mean, but he was belligerent. And he was good. Don is slim today and light, but his punching muscles are overdeveloped, and his favorite sport is still boxing. In his early days he'd come into a town, collar the first ragamuffin he'd meet on the street and ask, "Say—you know any kid in this town that wants a fight?" Usually there were plenty, and usually Don could take them, although he'd got whopped for it when he showed up at curtain time bruised and bleeding. That era ended suddenly when a gang of Chicago newsboys heard about the tough little punk down at the theater and ganged up on him. They gave him such a working-over that he was cautious from then on about advertising his pugnacity.

That wasn't often, of course. As a kid, Donald O'Connor's home town resembled a timetable. But there was one place he could halfway tag as his "home town"—one stationary place. That was Danville, Illinois, where his Uncle Will and Aunt Josie and their big family lived in a big house. Uncle Will was John O'Connor's brother. Irish, like Chuck, he had done all right in Danville in the plumbing business, and with his natural Gaelic gift for politics, had even been elected mayor a couple of times. Sticking around one place, he had also outdone his brother Jack by siring eleven children to Chuck's seven. A few extra visiting cousins make little difference in a family of 13. So between layoffs, or when they ran into bad luck or got busted, the O'Connor's made quick tracks for Danville. They had another haven, at Peru, Illinois, where an old friend ran a country club and where they could earn their keep entertaining until bookings opened up. But Danville was where Don remembers feeling like he belonged to a place longer than just for the run of the engagement.

Being a real stage actor, Don was a great glamour boy in Danville, and he played it to the limit. The other kids, seeing him come in off the road with wonderful stories about stage life, looked on him with feelings mixed with awe and resentment. The Danville boys yelled "Sissy" a few times at his dandified clothes—until they got their noses bloodied—but the girls tumbled like a load of bricks for his worldly charms. Closest of all to Don of his cousins was Lois, only a year older.

He used to tell Lois confidently, "When you and me grow up, we'll get married." Lois knew Cousin Don pretty well though, and she never took it too seriously. He told that to all the girls.

sweetheart on every circuit . . .

Because Don O'Connor was hardly ever without a sweetheart from the time he could learn to wink. And like a sailor, he had a girl in almost every port. He was so wised up for his years that usually they were older than he was, like the crush he had on a girl who used to travel with a sister act. He'd run across her here and there on the circuits. She had a turned up nose, and she could sing like a bird, even as a kid, and her name was Frances Gumm. Don and Frances wrote a love song together when they were just kids and rehearsed it. They were going to grow up and be big stars—and get married. But Judy got the jump on Don—as she was bound to. She became Judy Garland.

Life was never dull around Uncle Will's and Aunt Josie's when the Cousin O'Connors showed up. All of them loved to have fun, from Effie on down. They'd usually play a date at the Danville theater, and Don and Billy would get enrolled in school —only to be jerked out again as soon as the hungry O'Connor family fattened up or a play date arrived to support them again. They always made good enough money—on the standard time $500 a week for the act. But they were show people, and they spent it, or Jack and Effie and Millie, the oldest members, got mixed up in their weakness, poker, and lost the family roll. They never banked a cent. There was always more to be made in the next town. Happy-go-lucky was a phase coined for the O'Connors. And it was all for one and one for all—always.

As a youngster Don O'Connor never considered that it would ever be any other way. Life to him was "the boards," and the O'Connor family the center of the world. Once only, as a tiny tot, had he run away nursing a peeve. He was about five or so, and Brother Jack had spanked him or something. Don suspects he deserved it. Anyway, he lit out, resolved to show his family a thing or two. He got as far as two stories away in the same New York theatrical hotel where they stayed. A vaudevillian friend of his father came home that night and found Don sitting on his trunk, looking disgusted. "Our act's going to pieces," Don informed him. "I've shaken the dust. Say, can I join your act?" The friend hauled him by the ear back to his family.

pistol-packin' O'Connor . . .

Never in his young life, however, did Donald O'Connor ever consider the possibility of being anything but an entertainer. He used to say, when he was younger, that his big ambition was to be a grand opera singer. He still collects every Caruso record he can find. But Don never took lessons on anything in his life. He picked up the accordion and the drums and a honky-tonk piano proficiency, which he still has today. He learned a million tricks allied to show business, bits of magic, singing, dancing, juggling. But, in spite of the hard life actors led—and he'd had personal proof from the minute he let out his first baby cry—it never entered Don's head that when he got big he'd be anything else but an actor. Acting was for him.

He dramatized everything. Uncle Will had an old pistol around the house, without any cartridges. Don found it one day, and for a week the O'Connors wondered why the milkman and the bread man gave their house a wide berth. Finally learned it was because Don had been getting the drop on them with the real revolver every time they showed up and backed them off the place, hands up and terrified. He was playing a stick-up man.

He used this acting talent to wiggle out of scrapes, too. Once the Danville O'Connor kids and their friends staged a picnic when the Traveling O'Connors arrived. They had it out by the river. Effie O'Connor had lost enough children. Don was her baby, and she was always terrified of losing him. Particularly she feared the swift river. She told him not to dare go near it; if he did—there'd be plenty of trouble.

Well, some other boys were there; they dared Don, and he couldn't take a dare like a drip. So he went in, and when he came back home, he showed the telltale signs—wet hair, muddy socks and shoes. He knew he was in for it.

"I had to go in, Mother," explained Don nobly. "A girl fell in the river. The current grabbed her. She swirled down the stream. I heard her desperate cries for help . . ." and so on. He acted out the most gripping rescue drama imaginable, complete with all details, with himself in the role of the hero, rescuing the helpless maiden from a watery grave. Don sounded like he ought to have the Carnegie medal, at least, and Effie believed every word. But Lois, who had been there all the time, could hardly keep from exploding with the truth.

It was from Danville that the O'Connors left for California, the time that was to change 12-year-old Don's life.

Donald had been in California before. Once when he was still being wheeled around in a baby carriage, the O'Connor family, Chuck and Arlene and all, had played the old Hippodrome in Los Angeles, and another time when Don was only seven they'd come out for a Fanchon and Marco Revue and played all around Southern California—and Donnie O'Connor, again, had narrowly escaped with his life in the great California Earthquake of 1933.

This trip an even bigger upheaval was to hit the O'Connors. Hollywood was to do what even the Long Beach earthquake couldn't do. It was to break up the O'Connor family after all these years.

It started as just another circuit tour for the O'Connors. When they arrived in Los Angeles, strapped as usual for money, something went wrong with the bookings, and there they were without a salary. That's when their booking agent asked if they'd like to give a free show.

"Nothing doing," replied Jack, who was managing the business end of things then. "We O'Connors like to work—but not for free. It's not nourishing."

"But this is," laughed the agent. "You'll get a swell dinner. It's at the Motion Picture Relief Fund Annual Banquet. All the movie Big Shots will be there, and you never can tell what that'll lead to. Besides, it's a good cause."

Jack said okay. They came late to the Biltmore Bowl the next night. They went on with the act first and had dinner later. Right after they'd finished, it seemed, the agent came bustling up to their table.

"What did I tell you," he gasped. "They want you over at Paramount tomorrow to try out for a picture part!"

"We'll be there!" Jack grinned. "O'Connors on parade."

The agent yanked out his handkerchief and patted his face. "They've got Donald in mind for a Bing Crosby picture."

Nobody said much for awhile. Don finished his ice cream. Then he spoke up.

"That's out," he said. "It's the O'Connor Family—remember?"

The agent shrugged. "Just you they want," he repeated.

"I'm a vaudeville artist," said Don slowly. "I don't know anything about movies. I guess I'll just skip it."

A SMILE THAT GLISTENS

They'll tell you to eat your way to health . . . and sparkling dental work! Proper diet assists originally in building sound teeth. It later helps protect them against disease, through nourishment of tooth structure, through tooth exercise and through influence on mouth secretions.

In general these foods are best for building as well as maintaining sound teeth and healthy gums: fruits, green vegetables, milk and other dairy products, whole grain bread and cereals, eggs and some coarse foods requiring thorough chewing. Let your diet be a help to your teeth. Which reminds us of a simply awful pun: "Be true to your teeth, and they won't be false to you."

Dentist Duty. We're sure you know all about visiting your dentist twice a year . . . but here's a gentle reminder in case you're a bit forgetful. Visit him regularly for preventive dentistry, for a check-up and to have stains and tartar removed. Remember you're not only to run to the dentist, howling with pain, to have an aching molar pulled. He's there to catch tiny, hidden cavities and to fill them before they have a chance to grow to Grand Canyon proportions and cause you floods of agony.

A dentist can also do wonders at replacing missing molars and straightening crooked ones. Perhaps when you were young and careless, you chipped a front tooth—on a diving board, say, or in a sled collision. If it's gone uncorrected up to now, have it jacketed. No one but you will be the wiser, and you'll smile unselfconsciously again.

Smiles, Inc. A smile is part of a woman's charm. Not only movie stars have a public . . . a housewife meets hers at the grocery store, clubs, shops. Her smile may mean the difference between a small, brown-edged head of lettuce and a large, crisp, green-leafed one! So don't be afraid to smile. Glance at the chart on page 68. Treat your teeth to these beauty and health hints advocated by pert June Allyson. You'll be pleased with the happy results!

to play, in spite of the scene with Katharine Cornell. Before doing that scene, Miss Cornell invited him to spend the day at her home. He felt greatly honored, but he wasn't tongue-tied. They talked about dogs and other things they had in common, not about Shakespeare.

He's always wanted to write, and he always will. Movies were just a way to make money till he saw "A Star Is Born," which captured his imagination. After that, he wanted success in the movies, too. He's written some poetry and short stories which his friends like. "But of course," he tells you, "that doesn't mean very much."

Ray Sperry, who used to be Freddie Bartholomew's stand-in, has been Lon's friend since their days at the Mar-Ken Professional School. They had it all fixed up that in 1940 they'd buy a sloop and sail around the world, Lon writing as they went. In 1940 a war was on. Besides, they didn't have the money. But it's a dream postponed, not abandoned. In Lon's contract, there's another clause which says that, in five and a half years, if he's still working, he gets time off for his round-the-world trip.

Another dream's just come true, and a nightmare's banished. Somewhere he read that Eddie Cantor's grandmother, who meant everything to him, died as Eddie reached the brink of success. Lon was haunted by the fear that some such thing might happen to him. He wanted to make life easier for the folks before they were too old to enjoy it. Just before going off on location for "Home in Indiana," he bought the new house at Malibu. Just after he got back, they moved in.

The folks are Mother, Granny and Iya. How he started calling his grandfather Iya, Lon doesn't remember, but everyone calls him that now. He himself had been named Alonzo after his father, but was Bud—and still is—to family and friends. Not till "Stage Door Canteen" did he become Lon, and he's just getting used to it. Girls sometimes call him Lonnie, which irks him. Billy and Jackie irk him, too.

He's always lived in and around Los Angeles. His parents, divorced when he was five, have remained friends. After '29 they all had it tough. Iya's real estate business went to pot. He got a job as parking lot attendant. Mother and Granny took in sewing. One Christmas they couldn't scrape up enough to buy Lon a gift, so they had to tell him there was no Santa Claus. At the ripe age of eight, he had it pretty well figured out for himself. It didn't seem right that everyone should work but Lon.

Things got a little tougher. People weren't having much sewing done. Mother worked as a waitress, then as receptionist in a dental office. Iya went from night watchman at Universal to gateman at RKO. Through him, Granny got some extra work.

"I want to make money," Lon told his mother.

"You're pretty young."

"Some of the boys at school make money in the movies."

the hard way . . .

You got into movies through dancing or singing. Lon took tap lessons first, decided he wasn't much good and joined the Maxwell Choristers. M-G-M sent for them. If they'd been asked to sing, Lon would have been sunk. As luck would have it, he was picked as one of the torchbearers for the ballroom sequence of "Romeo and Juliet." He thinks maybe "Romeo and Juliet's" lucky for him.

Other jobs followed in movies and radio. Nothing startling. Extra work and bits. But enough so that, after a nervous breakdown, Mother was finally persuaded to quit work. Iya seemed to be set at RKO. Granny was managing the apartment house where they lived.

He discovered the world of books and ideas. He entered Chapman College, majored in English and took as many units of philosophy as he could squeeze in. Girls?—Oh yes. When he saw them, it was nice—and just as nice when he didn't. Girls weren't in it with boats and writing, with studying and getting ahead in "the industry," as he calls it.

Then one day, during sophomore year, he took time off to go to town for two interviews. One was at Republic, the other with Victor Sutker, who was casting for "Stage Door Canteen." He knew one of the soldiers was a young kid named "California," who'd never kissed a girl.

Lon was 19 and a Californian. He'd kissed girls in kid games like post office. It was just something you did, like playing darts. He'd never kissed a girl and really meant it. He hopes it doesn't sound egotistical, but he couldn't help thinking maybe this was the chance he'd been waiting for.

At Republic the part was a soldier, too. They said he looked too young, didn't look like the typical American soldier. Mr. Sutker said: "Take these two scenes home, and we'll call you back to read later on."

picture, because he was expecting to be called to the Army. He wouldn't even go back to New York for the opening unless Mother went along.

He got pretty stubborn about it. He thinks you'd be right to call him a stubborn guy. For instance, he made up his mind to buy a car when he finished high school. Financially, that turned out to be his worst year. He bought the car anyway and just got through paying for it. Another thing he wanted was a Great Dane. "I'll buy it," he promised himself, "when I get my first coast-to-coast program." That happened three years ago, and three years ago he bought Mac. "A Great Dane in an apartment!" said people. "You're crazy. Absolutely mad." But Mac wasn't unhappy in the apartment, and Lon was very happy, having him.

Mr. Lesser sent Mother along. Marjorie Riordan and her mother went, too. Marjorie's the girl Lon kissed in the picture. The four traveled together and had a wonderful time in the big town. And in the end Lon signed his contract. He couldn't afford not to, what with the terms and bonus Mr. Lesser offered.

But he didn't expect to make any more pictures till after the war. He'd had his physical exam for the Army. A week before the second was due, Twentieth Century-Fox intervened. They wanted to borrow him for "Home in Indiana." They asked for his deferment on the ground that the picture would be released to all overseas outposts before being shown at home. Since movies have been classified as an essential industry, the request was granted. And Lon bought a house.

treasure hunt . . .

They'd wanted one for so long. They were so house-hungry that they'd study ads and even go looking at houses for the sake of looking, knowing they couldn't afford even a small one. Now Lon made one of his decisions. His bonus from Mr. Lesser would almost cover the cost of a house. Then the folks would have it, no matter when he was called.

Because Lon loved the ocean, it had to be on the beach—and they found it at Malibu. He and his mother went down to look at it first, and the minute he clapped eyes on it, Lon knew that was his house. Green-and-white. One story—which made it nice for Granny who's beginning to get winded, climbing stairs. A high wall—which made it nice for Mac. The biggest fireplace they'd ever seen in a house—which made it nice for them all.

Granny took Iya down to see it. Having been in the real estate business, Iya catches flaws invisible to the amateur's eye. Besides, he's English and reserved. But even Iya said, "Maybe," which amounts to enthusiasm with him. So Lon bought it.

While he was gone, Mother and Granny made drapes and 12 string rugs—a fan-shaped one for in front of the fireplace. Lon got back on Tuesday and had the pleasure of seeing Granny turn over the management of the apartment house to her successor. On Wednesday, he went shopping with Mother and bought three lamps. On Thursday he had to report for work at 12:30, so he got up at six and drove down with some of the fragile things you can't trust to vans.

Iya proved how he felt about the house by doing an unprecedented thing—treating himself to a week off so he could share the fun of settling in. In all the world, no four people were happier.

Now that they're settled, Iya's with them only for week-ends, because he won't give up his job. Dad's a frequent visitor. He always wanted Lon to be something stable like a doctor. Now he thinks it's just as well his son turned out stubborn.

themselves. Having managed apartment houses, they're good at that kind of thing. Lon's bedroom is strictly nautical—sea-green rug, tropical drapes, ship book ends. Only the beds are like nothing a sailor ever slept in—two of them, both double, one for Lon, one for Mac. More often than not he bunks in with Lon, sometimes at the foot of the bed, sometimes with his head tucked cosily on the same pillow. Mac's short for MacDanois—Mac, son of—Danois, sort of French for Dane.

When he's not working, Lon's a night owl—stays up till two and loves to sleep till eleven. Breakfasts on dry toast and hot chocolate, except when he gets an urge for waffles. Likes sandwiches for lunch—tuna and peanut butter—and his favorite dinner is ground round, new peas, salad, milk and lemon pie. Lemon pie the way Granny makes it.

A day off—especially now at the beach—is a blank check from heaven. He spends it outdoors, paddles around on his surfboard, hauls his typewriter out and answers his fan mail. Mother helps him with that. And he studies. Wants to get his degree if he can, though right now the prospect looks dim. However, he's still carrying eight units of college work.

twilight and fire light . . .

The hour before dinner finds him in front of the fireplace with some reading matter—Whitman or Conrad, Don Blanding or Stephen Benet. Twilight and fire light and a quiet house and the smell of good cooking and an open book—that's something to keep with you as long as you live.

He never misses Sam Grafton's column and, when he's home at night, always tunes in on the gas company's music program. Cole Porter's his favorite popular composer and "Easy to Love" his favorite song. Anything Koussevitsky conducts, he'll listen to.

At the beach he wears as little as possible. Generally speaking, his interest in clothes is lukewarm. He'd rather stay at home than go out formal. His wardrobe is about evenly divided between browns and tans, which he likes, and blue, which his mother likes him in. Just now he's going through the tie-buying stage, because ties are about all a fellow can pick for himself that have color. But he rarely wears them.

He's a regular at the Hollywood Canteen. Used to work as a busboy, but now that the fellows know him, they seem to like him mingling around with them. He and Marjorie go out together quite often. If it's a twosome, they play miniature golf and stop in at a drive-in for nutburgers and a soda or a malt or a shake—doesn't matter, as long as it's chocolate.

Mostly they go with a crowd—the Gene Kelly crowd you've heard so much about. Gene and Betsy Kelly are among Lon's closest friends. They all gather at the Kellys or the Cronyns or the Wynns for games, music and mutual entertainment. Lon dislikes dancing. He's not bad, it just doesn't appeal to him. Neither do cigarettes nor liquor. He's not against either on principle, it's a matter of taste. Once he sampled a cigarette of Iya's and didn't like it. He takes issue with Emily Post on the etiquette of not drinking. She says you should accept the glass and touch it to your lips. That sounds silly to Lon. "Why waste it? I just don't take it."

Sometimes he and Marjorie wear matching colors. Just for the fun of it though. Romance? That makes him smile. "She's a sister of mine." And when Lon says it, you know it's the unvarnished truth.

One thing all you gals want to know: Is he like "California", off the screen? The answer is very definitely yes, and the proof's conclusive. Ten minutes, and you're shamelessly in love with the guy.

CANTEEN KID

nothing did. Then they told me about this place. One guy said I'd see movie stars, and another guy said, 'Nah, nobody shows up,' and I walk in and there you are. And now—well—now here I am talking to you." He flushed, conscious of having been carried away. "I hope you don't mind. What I'm trying to say is—on account of seeing you, Hollywood hasn't let me down."

"Why should I mind?" said Joan gently. "You've said some very nice things, and it makes me feel good."

That boy, symbolizing many, is why Joan goes to the Canteen week after week—every Tuesday night.

Once you're in, you forget you were ever tired, the boys are so smiley and glad to see you. Sometimes Joan dances, sometimes she's at the Snack Bar. Not long ago she sprained an ankle and couldn't dance. The boys were inclined to be skeptical—

"C'mon, Joan, don't give us that oldie—"

She had to stomp out and show them, after which they went protective on her. "Just sit on that high-chair. Never mind the grub—"

A soldier glared at a Marine who'd missed the excitement and innocently asked for coffee. "You got a bum ankle?—Then how's about you gettin' her a cup o' coffee?"

shine and sign . . .

As a matter of fact, Joan feels honored when they ask her for food. It seems so much more useful than just signing autographs. Good training, too, now that she's a waitress in "Cinderella Jones," plug! But generally, whoever's in charge at the Bar says, "Just shine and sign, honey. That's what they want from you—"

Even more than autographs, what they want is to talk. She wishes there were time to sit and talk to them all. She's never forgotten the crack one disgusted soldier made in a magazine article. "Iceland," he said, "was named not for its temperature, but for its girls." No matter how corny that line sounds about being a sister to them, it describes what they're looking for better than anything else. One of the nicest compliments ever paid her was by a sailor who'd been talking about his girl.

"You understand," he said, "and that kind of brings my own girl closer."

She thinks being an actress helps you to warm up easier. An actress meets so many different people, and she's used to the sociable atmosphere of the set and, come right down to it, the boys are the same kind of boys as the grips and juicers at the studio—younger, most of them, but with that same fun and friendliness and that easygoing American way—

If they're shy, she tries to break the ice by finding some place they've both been to—

"You're not from Michigan, by any chance?"

"Oh—just Detroit—"

When that happens, they go at it hammer-and-tongs, just a couple of home town pals—military tactics . . .

She's glad she's been to Canada, on account of the English boys who come in sometimes. They generally know Montreal and the Mount Royal Hotel, and they're homesick for snow and winter sports. The thing to remember about reminiscing though is, do they enjoy it or does it make them suffer more because they're so far from home? So you've got to feel your way, you can't go barging right in.

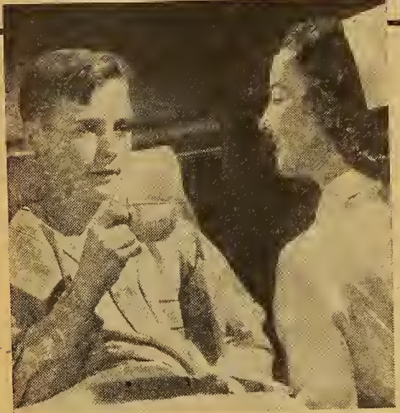
To Help A Child Build Up

AFTER AN ILLNESS



TODAY, many physicians are advising Ovaltine for the child who is run-down after illness—for these two reasons:

First, Ovaltine supplies the basic food substances—complete proteins absolutely necessary to repair muscle, nerve and body cells—and high-energy foods for vigorous health. Ovaltine is specially processed for easy digestion and taken in food-drink form, so it often "stays down" when nothing else seems to agree.

Second, Ovaltine is one of the richest food sources of vitamins and minerals in the world. Three glasses daily, made with milk as directed, provide a child's full minimum requirement of Vitamins A, B_1, D and G, and Minerals Calcium, Phosphorus and Iron. These vitamins and minerals, so important to speedy recovery, are often deficient in restricted diets.

Ovaltine is served in more than 1700 American hospitals. If someone in your family needs building up, try giving Ovaltine 2 or 3 times a day to speed the return of vigorous health.

DR. HAND'S TEETHING LOTION

Just rub it on the gums

It's funny when they give her what she calls the familiar-face routine. They stand and stare—who is she? Do I know her? Sometimes the light dawns in a grin. Or it doesn't dawn, and some bolder spirit puts the question direct.

"Are you one or aren't you?"

"Yes, I'm in pictures."

"Don't tell me, let me guess. What were you in last?—Oh, I missed that one—"

"I'm Joan Leslie," she says and ducks for the coffee urn, so she won't have to watch their faces get red. There was one boy standing at the edge of the crowd, looking so white and miserable that she wanted to push her way through and find out what was wrong. But you can't do that; they hate being made conspicuous—

At last his turn came at the Bar. "Would you sign this to my mother, Miss Leslie?"

"Anything special you'd like me to say?"

"I—I just had word that she's pretty sick. Maybe 'get well' or something—?"

She took her time and wrote a warm little message. Reading it, his eyes filled with tears, and she felt her own lids sting. She looked for him the following week, but he didn't show up. The next Tuesday she heard a jubilant "Hi!" Wreathed in smiles, he looked like a different boy—

"Mom's going to be okay. She's got your card propped up against the medicine glass and shows it off to all the neighbors. Says it's the thing she's proudest of—except me," he added bashfully.

running the gantlet . . .

As a rule, you can't go for special requests. There are too many boys and not enough time, and the boys understand and are satisfied with just the name. But once in a while you get somebody with ideas—

Holidays are special at the Canteen. They always need extra help, so Joan volunteered for Thanksgiving Day. She and Bob Alda worked together, Bob carving turkey, Joan heaping cardboard plates. In between they signed autographs—

Along came one of Uncle Sam's more enterprising gobs and stuck a cardboard plate under her nose. "Look, here's what I want you to write: 'My heart belongs to you, Joe—' Joe Allen's the name, but you just put Joe—'My heart belongs to you, Joe, I'll be waitin' for you, love and kisses—' then a lip-print and your name through it. Cute, huh?"

Joan tried to laugh it off.

"Don't you see I can't?" she protested. "If I did it for you, I'd have to do it for everybody."

"Well then, just love and kisses and the lip-print. I gotta have the lip-print—"

In desperation she grabbed the plate and wrote "To my favorite heckler—" Before she could sign, someone yelled for coffee. She turned back just in time to see a busboy pick up Joe's plate, scoop a mess of half-eaten beans into it, stack it on top of a pile of dirty plates and march off, whistling. Joe stood and stared in a kind of paralysis. Then he shook his head slowly. "Fate!" he muttered. "It ain't to be—" and lost himself in the crowd.

Her most embarrassing moment came one night as she herself danced with another sailor who took his title as King of the Jivesters seriously. Joan had come straight from the studio where they'd given her a beautiful up-hairdo which wasn't, however, built for heavy seas. The music grew warmer and warmer, ditto the King. He swung her and caught her and whirled her away, and the pins started flying. Joan grew conscious of a worried-looking youngster on the sidelines, and wondered vaguely what he was worried about. At last he came striding toward them and cut in purposefully, for all the world like Harold the Hero rescuing her from the clutches of Jim Dalton. But instead of dancing, he drew her off the floor. "Your rat shows," he informed her. "I'll hold the wolves off while you fix it."

That's the protective type. Then there's the deadpan ribber, and you can't be quite sure whether he's laughing with you or at you. The one with the broken-beer-bottle line, for instance. Every time they danced, he'd tell her about some friend who was dying to meet her—

"He'd come three thousand miles across broken beer bottles to dance with you."

"Barefoot, no doubt?" she flips back.

"No doubt. Where would he get shoes?"

This went on and on till the gag got to be pretty tired. But Joan played along. Why not, since it took so little to amuse him? Then one night he asked if she'd sit the dance out. He said he wouldn't be coming back to the Canteen, it looked as if they were headed overseas—

"I want to thank you for putting up with my stale jokes. They must have been pretty tiresome. You know—you're a good sport, Joan. I guess I was trying to get your goat. But he never showed—"

"He's got a long way to come," said Joan demurely—

"Three thousand miles across broken beer bottles," they chanted, and people turned their heads to see what was so funny.

There's also the romantic type, as exemplified by the boy who'd seen "Stage Door Canteen."

His eyes were rapt, his voice intense—

"Miss Leslie—" Not Joan—perish forbid!—did "California" call his deity Katharine?—"Miss Leslie, do you remember the poem you said in 'The Sky's the Limit'?"

"You mean the one about the man I wanted to marry—?"

"Yes. Would you recite it for me, please, Miss Leslie?"

She glanced hastily around. Well, let them laugh. The only thing was, would she be able to go through it? Looking back into the lost-puppy-dog eyes upturned to her, she took the plunge—

"A creature not too bright or good
For human nature's daily food.
For transient sorrows, simple wiles,
Praise, blame, love, kisses, tears and smiles—"

He pulled a sigh up from the toes of his G.I. shoes, murmured a simple, soulful thank you, turned on his G.I. heel and walked off, gazing into space. Joan dabbed a handkerchief at her face. "Coffee, boys?"

the broken record . . .

There was another young romantic present one night—Gerard Darrow, aged 9. He and the other Quiz Kids collected autographs as zealously as if they'd never heard of an I.Q. As Joan handed the book back, Gerard spoke with impressive fervor, "This is the most exciting moment of my entire life, Miss Leslie. I'll never forget it." Joan was charmed. The words echoed in her ears—or were they an echo? There was nothing disembodied about the clear treble, sounding off yet more fervently a few feet away. "This is the most exciting moment of my entire life, Miss Hayward. I'll never forget it—"

That's what he said to all the girls.

Her own most exciting moment occurred one night when a voice called, "Hi, Terror!" She whirled swiftly, her face alight—

On a bond selling tour in Washington, she'd been shown through a bomber. As she talked to the crew members, one said, "Hey, wait a minute, fellas, we haven't named this ship yet. How's for letting Joan name it?"

"Swell—"

"She's a redhead. She'll bring us luck."

They brought a stepladder. She was to chalk the name in, and her handwriting would be traced later in paint. "But what are we going to call it—?"

After her, of course. But also they wanted something with fire—

"I've got it. The Leslie Terror—"

That's why "Hi, Terror!" set her pulses leaping. Yes, it was one of the original crew. Yes, their ship had seen action in the Attu and Kiska fighting, had been damaged but not beyond repair. The boys had come through okay—

"Maybe because you're a redhead."

"Maybe because I prayed," she said to herself.

What impresses Joan most about the servicemen she meets is their spirit—the way they accept the job, the way they loathe any trace of hero-worship—even those that come back with stripes and medals—you're not supposed to notice such things. The way they're so grateful for what you do, when what you do is so little. Often, when her shift is over, she doesn't have the heart to go home if they ask her not to—

"Why do you have to go?"

"I've got to be up at 7—"

"We've got to be up at 5:30—"

"Oh dear, I know—"

Her hours are long, but theirs are longer. Her work is safe, theirs is difficult and dangerous— It makes her ashamed.

One letter she treasures especially, because it expresses so simply and beautifully what she herself feels and can't put into words—the spirit of the men, the spirit of the Canteen, the spirit of America.

"Dear Joan Leslie:

> I'm one of the hundreds you were dancing with Tuesday. You won't remember me, but I'll never forget you . . . I want to tell you why. It's not because you're pretty, though you are. It's not because you're a good dancer, though you're that, too. It's not even because you're becoming a big star. To be honest with you, I didn't even know who you were till they called you to the platform.
>
> I'll never forget you because you made me want to live. Your sincerity, your friendliness—those are the things that made my heart beat faster. No, not for you, Miss Leslie—I haven't a crush on you—I have a crush on the things you stand for. I want to fight to live in a world where a girl like you can smile and bring happiness to a guy like me. You and your cohorts are doing that at the Canteen now. We're on our way to make a few adjustments.
>
> Carry on,
>
> Bill."

Bill was wrong about just one thing. She remembers him all right. She'll remember him as long as she lives.

Pin-up picture for the man who "can't afford" to buy an extra War Bond!

YOU'VE HEARD PEOPLE SAY: "I can't afford to buy an extra War Bond." Perhaps you've said it yourself . . . without realizing what a ridiculous thing it is to say to men who are dying.

Yet it is ridiculous, when you think about it. Because today, with national income at an all-time record high . . . with people making more money than ever before . . . with less and less of things to spend money for . . . practically every one of us has extra dollars in his pocket.

The very least that you can do is to buy an extra $100 War Bond . . . above and beyond the Bonds you are now buying or had planned to buy. In fact, if you take stock of your resources, you will probably find that you can buy an extra $200 . . . or $300 . . . or even $500 worth of War Bonds.

Sounds like more than you "can afford"? Well, young soldiers can't afford to die, either . . . yet they do it when called upon. So is it too much to ask of us that we invest more of our money in War Bonds . . . the best investment in the world today? Is that too much to ask?

in "Golden Boy" and continued his march to success. He married dimpled, dark-eyed Brenda Marshall, legally changed his name and hers to Holden and fathered a son, Peter Westfield Holden—the Westfield in honor of the younger Beedle brother, Bob.

When war came, Bill joined the Air Corps. Bob and Dick both joined the Navy. Dick went to boot camp, but Ensign Bob was placed on active duty in the South Pacific.

The word filtered home with heart-breaking inescapability. First one letter arrived at the address of the elder Beedles. It was from an officer who had served with Bob; he mentioned in glowing terms the ability and courage of the young Ensign. Then a letter arrived from a shipmate of equal rank, telling something of the circumstance of his death. Finally there arrived the wire from the War Department saying merely that Ensign Robert Beedle was missing in action.

During the ensuing week, proving the curious way of life, Brenda Marshall Holden received her first word from her father since the fall of the Philippines. Returning passengers on the Gripsholm brought news that he was interned in Manila, that he was well, that he was keeping himself busy with work.

Brenda cried again, but these tears—unlike those bitterly shed for Bob—were sweet.

ALADDIN WITHOUT LAMP:

It has long been Alan Ladd's habit to accumulate any stray serviceman he happens to see, bring the chap home for dinner.

The sailor whom Alan picked up a few weeks ago was trying to get home. His sister was having a baby, presumably within that week. The sister's husband was in service in the South Pacific, so the brother was doing his best to be with the expectant mother.

The Ladds staked him to a long distance telephone call which assured him that the stork hadn't yet appeared. Then Sue bundled up some clothing which Alana had outgrown, and the sailor was transported to the station, round-tummied with dinner, round-eyed with wonder and full-hearted with gratitude.

On the way home, when they were halted by a stop light, Alan leaned over to kiss his wife. Like tinsel-thrilled children they said, "Don't we have a wonderful time?"

THE KIDDIE CAR SET:

Judy Garland's niece, Judeleine Sherwood, is now six; an energetic young thing beating out a bit of fame for herself. She writes songs so good that Jose Iturbi, hearing some of them, decided to rearrange them slightly and to prepare them for publication in the form of a book of nursery songs. Judy—having turned artist—is doing the illustrations.

Ordinarily a quick study and a flawless deliverer of lines, Ray Milland ruined a morning's shooting by fluffing one scene after another. "What's wrong?" the director finally asked in bewilderment.

Ray looked sheepish. He was worried. Danny (the Milland scion) was to have his tonsils removed the following morning. Ray hadn't slept the night before, and he didn't expect much rest tonight.

"Danny kicking up quite a fuss, huh?"

Looking even more sheepish, Ray explained that Danny was totally indifferent. "I'm the one who's suffering."

The following morning he drove Danny and Mrs. Milland down to the hospital. "You wait outside," smiled Mrs. Milland. "You won't be helping Danny by going upstairs, and you will be torturing yourself."

So Ray waited. He burned his way through three packs of cigarettes and blinked his way through several magazines. After 15 minutes of Dennis Morgan's older son Stan and his daughter Kirsten were overheard by their bemused Dad in deepest conversation. "I know the worst words in the world," confided Kirsten in a horrified whisper.

"I bet you don't know as bad words as I do," sniffed Stan, not to be outdone by a kid sister. "Tell me your words."

Kirsten breathed deeply. "I know 'doggone fool!'" she admitted amid vocal exclamation points.

Stan shrugged, his brief laugh a masterpiece of deprecation. "That's nothing," he said. "I know 'lady's girdle.'"

TECHNICAL ADVISER UNAVAILABLE:

"Heaven," proclaimed the Warner Brothers call sheet, "is working on Stage 14."

This startling declaration was the result of filming "The Horn Blows at Midnight," one sequence of which finds Mr. Jack Benny strolling amid celestial clouds. An emergency arose at noon when the entire angelic cast zoomed over to the Green Room for luncheon; their wings were so large that there wasn't room to seat the sky-kids and accommodate, at the same time, mere ordinary mortals. So the cast had to be allowed an additional 30 minutes for luncheon so that they could be served in small companies over a long period of time.

Another technical problem arose: What do angels wear on their feet? The unadorned human foot being signally non-photogenic, some sort of gear had to be perfected. Finally someone decided after diligent skull searching, that angels probably wear golden sandals. Therefore, the proper number of golden sandals were constructed. About the same time someone else decided that the entrance courts of Heaven would be cloud-strewn, so smoke pots were brought to the set, and all actors were obscured from toe to hipline by cumulus clouds which also hid the golden sandals.

LINES ABOUT QUINES:

If the employees of the Carolyn Kelsey shop in San Francisco have noted with pleasure that one of their most faithful customers is Mrs. Richard Quine (née Susan Peters), they might be interested in the reason.

Susan, as avid readers of this column know from previous reports, has been living in San Francisco, keeping house for her Coast Guard husband. While they were window-shopping shortly before Christmas, Susan saw a yellow sweater vest displayed in the Kelsey window and expressed a desire for it.

Dick didn't have an opportunity to finish his Christmas shopping until the evening of the 24th. Breathless, with coat fluttering in the breeze, he reached the shop door just as it was being locked. He tapped until one of the salesgirls, noting his uniform, allowed him to enter. He bought the vest and tendered a $20 bill in payment.

The owner of the shop had closed the cash register for the day; he was in jovial Christmas spirits, and he obviously wanted to benefit the armed forces, so he waved the bank note aside. Not only was Dick supplied with the sweater, but he was invited to join the festive staff in a quick Tom & Jerry.

Completely overwhelmed, he took the gift home to Susan who was deeply touched. The sweater, of course, became one of Susan's most treasured possessions.

MASK TASK:

Currently, Bette Davis is deep in production of "Mr. Skeffington." The scenes being shot show Mrs. Skeffington as a beautiful woman who has aged toward the late fifties. In order to achieve realism, for which Bette is a stickler, Perc Westmore's make-up department planned and executed a very lightweight rubber facial mask which has the quality of falling into hundreds of delicate lines. It requires 2½ hours each morning for this mask to be adjusted.

After a week's shooting, Bette found that the mask was drying her own skin to the point where she looked as if she had spent 20 days in a lifeboat, so each day she had to spend another hour having a facial.

Personal aside to Miss Davis: Van Johnson, the brilliant young actor under contract to M-G-M, is one of your most ardent admirers. He'd give a lot to take you to dinner.

(This marks the inauguration of the Dudley Date Bureau.)

SOUPED-UP SURREY:

Lon McCallister is in love.

The affair, however, is not a happy thing because he has a rival with previous rights of ownership.

Relax, girls, the love of the McCallister life is the dark blue Fiat owned by Bill Eythe. This raunchy vehicle gets a mere 50 miles to a gallon of gas. Lon's buzz wagon gets a meager 18; furthermore, it is hoodooed. The other day after Lon had his car serviced, he discovered that the oil had been drained.

Oh, fine. So back the car went to the garage, giving Lon a good excuse for borrowing the Fiat. While the car is in Lon's possession, he spends hours dreaming up a way to trade Bill out of the buggy. So far no success.

HOME TOWN BOY:

Bob Walker—just as attractive wearing his glasses as he is without them—recently made his first post-fame trip back to the old home town in Utah. He took his small son, Bobby, with him.

The second evening Bob was home, about 20 of the neighborhood kids dropped in to ask questions and to get Bob's autograph.

He spoke over the local radio in behalf of War Bond sales and gave speeches at several of the schools. For the first time Bob began to taste the sweetness of triumph.

Then Selznick broke up the idyll by summoning Bob back (after a week's vacation) for further scenes in "Since You Went Away."

NON-SKID LID:

Maria Montez recently out-Hedda-d Hopper by appearing in a CORK hat. The shape was traditional sailor, and the decorations were pressed wood roses. Recommended for those planning to tip over in canoes.

FOR ALWAYS

They couldn't find the kind of simple bridal gown she wanted. Everything had trains a mile long. But there was a black dress that was perfect, and if they could have it copied in time— Ordinarily, it would have taken them weeks. But Ellie was practically family, and for a family wedding Mr. Joseph and the girls could work a miracle.

It wasn't only that they got the dress ready, it was all the little extras that no money could have paid for. Like sewing a blue fourleaf clover into the bodice. Like making her bring one of her white slippers down, so they could stitch a sixpence into it for luck. And after her last fitting, they were all lined up to wish her happiness. And the doorman said, "Not today you don't get your own car, Miss Powell. Today's something special," and he brought it round himself.

The whole thing was like a wedding present—a box of good will tied up with friendliness—that sent her home in a glow.

* * *

It was to be a home wedding—15 or 20 guests, with more coming in for the reception later. The mantel in Ellie's living room was banked with white chrysanthemums and gladioli. She wanted to stick to every possible tradition, but they had to break the one about not seeing each other before the ceremony, because Glenn didn't get in from camp till that afternoon, and they had to rehearse.

The bride made no pretense of hiding her excitement. The groom, outwardly cool, gave himself away by bumbling aimlessly out at one door and in at another.

To both, the all-important thing was an atmosphere of simplicity and friendliness. They hadn't wanted to be married by a stranger. So Glenn had asked Dr. Ray Moore, whose Sunday School he'd attended at Santa Monica, to perform the ceremony. Ned Crawford, one of his oldest friends, was best man, and the matron of honor was Stebby, Ellie's secretary. Dave Gussin, her pianist, was to play, and she was to be given away by her mother.

The minister must have forgotten that Ellie was a dancer. "Do you think you'll be able to kneel, Miss Powell? It may be a little awkward because of the long dress. You've got to go down on both knees, you know." She went down. "Oh—that's excellent."

* * *

The hardest time was between rehearsal and ceremony. It seemed days and months. Glenn paced in the dining room. Ellie waited in the bedroom. For something blue she had the four-leaf clover, for something old—her slippers, for something borrowed—Stebby's handkerchief.

Her eye fell on the phone. Horrors, suppose it rang while they were saying "I do." Against all the rules of the telephone company, she stuck the receiver under her mattress. Let it ring there.

The hairdresser came in. "I just saw your bouquet. Such lovely sweetpeas—"

A swift twinge, which Ellie refused even to acknowledge. She adored sweetpeas. Sweetpeas were beautiful—

"A little everydayish for a wedding, though," said the twinge.

In came the bouquet. White orchids. They'd been ribbing her. "Just the same, I'd have loved sweetpeas, too," she told the twinge firmly.

More days and months—

* * *

Eight o'clock. In the living room, Dave played softly as the guests were being seated. "Oh Promise Me" and "I Love You Truly." Then he did something sweet and unexpected. At opposite ends of the house, Glenn and Ellie smiled as he broke into "Sweet Leilani," which has a special significance for them. It was almost as if the walls had melted, and they'd suddenly looked into each other's eyes.

As the last guest took his place, Dave struck a chord. Glenn came in from the dining room with Ned. To the strains of the "Wedding March"—old but always new for the new troth it plights—Ellie appeared on her mother's arm, preceded by Stebby in powder-blue. All she and Glenn saw through a haze were each other. Mrs. Powell stood between them till the minister asked, "Who gives this woman?" Then she joined their hands and stepped back. All they heard was, "I now pronounce you man and wife." All they felt was in their eyes as Glenn kissed his wife for the first time.

* * *

Everyone cried but Glenn. All evening he was the busiest person. Ellie hardly saw him. But then she was pretty busy herself. They did cut the cake together, and they did snatch a minute to look at the inscriptions in their rings. And that was another miracle, because they'd never said a word to each other about it, yet the inscriptions were almost identical.

* * *

To understand why they picked San Francisco for a honeymoon takes us back. About a month earlier, Ellie had done two weeks of personal appearances in San Francisco. She'd stayed at the St. Francis, and the St. Francis had become a place of warmth to her.

When she'd first started writing to Glenn at boot camp, she'd hit on the notion of using blue stationery, so the minute he spotted the color in the shuffle of letters, he'd know that one was coming up for him. Now they both use blue stationery.

Every night when she got in from the theater, Julius, the doorman at the St. Francis, would say: "Seems to me there's a blue envelope inside." The girl at the desk would have her little joke. "Sorry. No letter today." Then she'd bring it out from behind her back. The whole hotel was wise to Ellie's envelopes, and all the world loves a lover.

There was Bob, too, boss of his own taxi. Ellie'd engaged him to take her to and from the theater. Bob knew about Glenn, and Ellie knew about Bob's two children and his swell wife who was up waiting, no matter what time he got in.

So when Glenn asked where she'd like to go for the honeymoon, she said San Francisco. "Because I like them at the St. Francis, and they like me, and it'll be a little like going home. Besides—don't laugh at me, Glenn—I'll be kind of proud to take you back there and show you off."

He laughed but said he'd love it. Stebby made the reservations. They boarded the train Sunday evening in a hail of rice.

"What d'you suppose they're all smiling at?" Ellie murmured.

"Look," said Glenn. A trail of rice marked their passage through the car. Rice gleamed in the folds of Ellie's mink coat, dropped from her hat into the lap of her blue pinstripe suit.

They sat like scared kids, afraid to open their mouths. A waiter stopped before them, two B and Bs on his tray. "The gentleman down at the far end sent these up," he beamed. "Wants to drink your health."

The gentleman at the far end lifted his own B and B in smiling salute. Their answering smiles were grateful, if a little sick. Presently Glenn said in desperation, "Let's go."

Back in the compartment, they clung to each other and howled. "Anyway," gasped Ellie, "it was awfully sweet of that man—"

All along Ellie'd been saying, "How nice if we could get Bob to take us around." And he was at the train to meet them. Stebby had let him know—

"Hope you two'll be as happy as me and the missus," grinned Bob.

And Julius said as he opened the cab door, "Welcome home, Mr. and Mrs. Glenn Ford, and no more blue envelopes."

Nowhere could they have had a lovelier homecoming. Harry Owens and his band were playing at the St. Francis. Not only did Harry write "Sweet Leilani," but he and Glenn were old friends.

There were flowers on their table in the Mural Room that night. Harry came over. "I hear they played 'Sweet Leilani' at your wedding. Well, from now on, it's your song. I'm going to find the original and dedicate it to you—"

Returning to the grandstand, he called for a fanfare. The room fell silent. "Two people are here who were married Saturday," said Harry. "This is their song, which I've just given them for always."

The silence was broken by the first notes of "Sweet Leilani." Across the table Glenn and Ellie smiled at each other. Next moment she was in his arms, and they were dancing to the melody of their own song, and to a deeper melody in their hearts. Whether anyone else danced, they wouldn't know. For them, nobody else was there.

Ten perfect days. Never by any chance did Ellie refer to Glenn as Glenn or Mr. Ford. It was always, "my husband." Looking back, she thinks maybe she overdid it and wouldn't mind having it all to overdo again—

Dinner downstairs every night. Their first-week anniversary at the Copacabana. The day the flowers came, and she stood mooning over the box, because it was the first thing addressed to Mrs. Glenn Ford. But who in San Francisco could be sending her flowers? The mass of fragrant pink carnations told her. Who but her husband would know that pink carnations were her favorite flower?

* * *

There were no tears at parting. Ellie would have felt like a pig to cry. They were too happy and grateful to have had so much—ten perfect days.

Glenn gets in a couple of times a month—for part of Saturday, and Sunday. He drops in at the studio where Ellie's making "Sensations of 1944" for Andrew Stone, then goes to see his mother. Saturday evenings, he and Ellie are alone. Night clubs never meant much to them; now Glenn revels in the quiet of his home.

They go for a walk with Tanz—short for Tanzer, or dancer. He takes his name literally—does wild Nijinski leaps when he smells Glenn coming.

After dinner they sit before the fire, reading, talking, listening to records. Ellie used to wear slacks round the house, but no more. Glenn doesn't like them.

Ellie's usual breakfast is a poached egg on toast and coffee. Sunday morning she tries to keep up with Glenn, but flounders halfway. He starts on eggs and toast, moves on to sausage and wheatcakes, winds up with cinnamon buns and applesauce. Yes, he eats lunch, too.

Afternoons they get together with the family, and maybe one or two close friends. Glenn and his mother have a couple of hours alone. Incidentally, Glenn's mother hasn't yet got over the wonder of having a daughter—a daughter who phones from the studio every noon just to say hello—a daughter you can talk woman stuff to, like shopping and recipes.

Ellie's making no picture plans. If Glenn's still at the base when "Sensation" is finished, she'll go down there and be with him as long as she can.

Among dancers, the name of Eleanor Powell outshines most. Her kind of work is more exacting than that of an actress—it takes more time and energy and self-discipline—so many hours for rehearsals, so many for rest, else you won't be in shape. You can't meet those grinding demands and give your best to your husband. And she won't give Glenn second best. That's not her idea of marriage.

So when the war ends, there'll be just one career in the family, and she'll be Mrs. Glenn Ford, trying to help in what she calls an invisible way. She's in training already, takes lessons from Anna, her cook, because Glenn's crazy about Anna's Hungarian dishes.

She also takes care of Glenn's fan mail.

Ellie's no glamour girl. She'd rather buy a lamp for her house than a diamond for her throat. She's rather get a monogrammed handkerchief than orchids because the handkerchief shows that your friend thought of you beforehand and didn't rush out at the last moment just to buy you something. That's what she adores about Glenn—his thoughtfulness—the sweetheart bouquet he sent her when the picture started—the little notes he writes. They're all worn thin from being carried around and lying under her pillow.

Glenn didn't fall in love with a dancing marvel, but with the warmth and kindness and simplicity of a girl named Ellie.

Harry Owens gave them a song for always. We string along with Harry. You can't know Glenn and Ellie without believing that the love and faith they started with will be theirs for always.

ADVENTURES OF MARK TWAIN

For Huckleberry Finn, Tom Sawyer and Sam Clemens, tiny, quiet town of Hannibal, Missouri, and Mississippi rolling beside it is fraught with imaginary danger, wild adventure.

River lures Sam (Fredric March) from brother's print shop. Later, with Steve Gillis (Alan Hale), he goes west to find gold. When that fails, he becomes newspaper reporter.

ON a grassy levee by the Mississippi, a small boy lies day dreaming. His dreams are of the river—the lazy, powerful river that drifts by his home town of Hannibal, Missouri. The small boy is Samuel Clemens, and those young dreams are later to become known to readers all over the world as "The Adventures of Tom Sawyer" and "Huckleberry Finn."

Warner Brothers have built an exciting picture around Sam Clemens' life, and Fredric March makes a down payment on this year's Oscar with his portrayal of the title role. He never gets out of character for an instant, and he makes "Mark Twain" as humorous and gallant and real a figure as you have ever seen on the screen. Alexis Smith, who is coming right along as an actress, plays his sweet, inspiring wife, Livvy.

Sam's first story is reprinted throughout country. Beautiful wife Livvy (Alexis Smith) prods him to recall his childhood, write "Tom Sawyer."

Financial failures, debts press him into tireless globe-trotting lecture tour. Before Livvy's death, there's swift, tender idyll in Italy.

MOVIE REVIEWS

The rest of the cast is spangled with names like Donald Crisp, Alan Hale, Walter Hampden and C. Aubrey Smith.

Did you ever wonder why Samuel Clemens chose the name of "Mark Twain" to write under? The answer goes back, like so much in his life, to his days on the Mississippi. Young Sam runs away from his brother's printing shop to answer the siren call of the river. He becomes a dashing, handsome, afraid-of-nothing pilot on a river steamer. In one of the most beautiful and stirring scenes in the picture, he pilots his boat through a reef-filled channel on a foggy night, into the safe water beyond. And safe water, to every river pilot, is known as "Mark Twain"—the words the negro boatmen call out as they take the depth soundings over the side of the boat.

Sam Clemens remembers those words later, when he is a newspaperman in Virginia City during the gold rush. He uses them as a "pen name" on a piece of humorous writing he is sending to an Eastern magazine. The sketch is called "The Jumping Frog" and is founded on a financially disastrous, but very funny, experience which Sam and his gold hunting partner, Steve (Alan Hale), had with Bret Harte (John Carradine).

Sam is ready to try anything these days to make money—even writing. He has left his beloved river and come West in the gold rush for just one reason. He has seen a picture carried by a young Easterner, Charles Langdon, of his sister Olivia. "That," says Sam firmly, "is the girl I'm going to marry." On the surface it looks impossible for a wild, penniless Westerner ever to win beautiful Olivia Langdon. But nothing is impossible to Sam Clemens —he is to prove that time and again in later life. The Civil War comes along now to interfere with his search for a fortune, and Sam joins a Southern regiment. When the war is over, he discovers to his utter astonishment that he is known throughout the country as "Mark Twain," the author of "The Jumping Frog."

He is asked to lecture in New York, and there luck steps in. For Olivia Langdon is in the audience, and Sam succeeds in meeting her after the lecture. He not only meets her, he goes right back to Buffalo with her and invites himself to stay at her home. Her stern, conservative father (Walter Hampden) promptly "uninvites" him, but Sam gets around that, too. By now Livvy has fallen in love with this dashing young man with the unexpected sense of humor, and they marry in spite of her father's disapproval. Eventually they have a son whom Sam adores. When the boy dies, he is inconsolable. Livvy, to distract his mind from his grief, persuades him to write the story of his adventures as a boy on the Mississippi. The result is "Tom Sawyer" and fame.

Sam turns out books thick and fast after that. Not the kind he would like to write —he'd love to do a serious novel that would be "worthy of Livvy." But his public wants humor, and Sam gives it to them. He has to. His investments are always disastrous, and he does absurdly altruistic things which keep him broke. Some of his most delightful books are written with bankruptcy staring over his shoulder. And in the end he realizes that the gift of laughter is worth all the "serious" books in the world!

You'll find that "The Adventures of Mark Twain" is a living, glowing picture completely dominated by the gallant, laughing figure of the man himself.—War.

P. S.

Title is result of Gallup poll. Majority of the people questioned said they would prefer to see the adventurous highlights of the Samuel Clemens career to some fiction-laced version of his life. . . . So Producer Jesse Lasky decided to call his film, simply, "The Adventures of Mark Twain." . . . Privileged visitors to the set were invited by Fredric March to inspect his built-on nose, most intricate part of a fabulous make-up that took sometimes as long as two hours to apply. Experts Perc Westmore and Gordon Bau had to make March look like Twain from his early 20's through to his death at 75. They worked from hundreds of available photographs plus 100 feet of film taken of Twain a few years before his death. March studied this film carefully, says it helped him perfect his characterization. . . . Warner Bros. research department had a stiff work-out on this one, compiled a 72-page Mark Twain bibliography listing its source material. 1750 books were used, 2345 photographs collected—originals or copies of every available portrait of Twain. Thousands of authentic props had to be gathered before production began, ranging from Mississippi River steamboats to jumping frogs. . . . Alexis Smith announced her engagement to Craig Stevens the day before she became "engaged" to Freddy March in the picture. . . . Importance of character, not length of space in the script, governed the choice of the other roles. . . . John Carradine was engaged to portray Bret Harte. C. Aubrey

The Kotex Tampon for Internal Protection

Smith has just one scene—but an outstandingly important one—as Lord Curzon, chancellor of Oxford University. . . . Alan Hale, who plays Twain's mining partner, had a part in "Pudd'n Head Wilson," first Mark Twain story to be produced as a picture. Jesse Lasky made it in 1916. Hale made "The Covered Wagon" for Lasky in 1925, was told he did a good job and would be used again soon in a Lasky picture. This is it. . . . Because Twain loved cats, the sound recorder went mildly mad trying to keep the purrrrs of 21 assorted pussies out of the way of the dialogue. As often as possible during scenes the cats' little faces were pushed gently into saucers of milk to keep them silent. . . . Studio technicians had to create an authentic duplicate for picture purposes of Halley's Comet. Solved the problem by using a photograph published in 1910 as a model.

THE IMPOSTOR

Hollywood has finally done right by Jean Gabin. In "The Impostor" he has a role that suits him as well as those in his old French pictures. Jean is not a conventional hero type, but he is an actor of ability and charm. Both qualities are displayed to advantage in this part.

Fate plays crazy tricks sometimes. It plays one in Tours, France, in 1940. A man named Clement (Jean Gabin) is being led to the guillotine. He is to die for the murder of a policeman in a street brawl. But the Nazis pick that moment to bomb Tours, and it is the jailers and executioner who die, not Clement. He escapes and hitches a ride on a truck with some soldiers. Again fate plays a trick, for the truck is strafed by an airplane, and the soldiers are killed while Clement is untouched. This time he acquires a valuable possession—the identification papers of one of the soldiers.

So now Clement, the murderer, no longer exists. In his place is Sergeant LaFarge. The sergeant joins some soldiers bound for Africa on a freighter. One of them is an odd shy little farmer from Normandie, named Monge (John Qualen). He attaches himself to the sergeant like a stray puppy. LaFarge is at first annoyed, then curiously touched. He has never had a friend before, and he finds that it does unexpected things to his tough cynicism. Things like making him join the Fighting French in Africa, instead of stealing off into the interior as he had planned. They are assigned to building an airport in the jungle, and when the lieutenant in charge falls ill, LaFarge takes over responsibility. He does an outstanding job. By now he is a changed man. Friendship and a realization of what France means to them all have given him something to fight for. He is no longer an outcast. From now on he distinguishes himself in battle and becomes widely known as a hero. Too widely known, for two people turn up who have known the real LaFarge. One is a man who fought with him in France. The other is his fiancée—

It's a tense situation, and the denouement is excitingly handled. Richard

P. S.

This story of the Free French was written from an original idea of Julien Duvivier's, director of the picture. The first draft was written entirely in French by Mr. Duvivier and translated into English by studio writers. . . . Script had been ready for three years, but producers refused to film it until Jean Gabin was available for the lead. . . . Jean left immediately after this role to join the Free French Navy as a Lieutenant in the Quartermaster Corps. This was his third enlistment in the French armed forces. He was in the Army during the German invasion of France in both wars. When France signed an Armistice with Germany in this war, Mr. Gabin managed to get out of France and come to America to help fight for his country with the Allies. When General DeGaulle formed the new French Army and Navy he was one of the first to apply for enlistment.... Camp DeGaulle, the original Free French headquarters in the Congo Jungle, was duplicated at Sherwood Forest, California, and the cast and crew spent three weeks on location at this spot. Desert fighting scenes took place near Palm Springs. . . . First picture for Ellen Drew in eight months. She's been in England entertaining troops and selling British bonds. . . . Peter Van Eyck plays his first sympathetic role, that of a Frenchman fighting for his native land. A German, Mr. Van Eyck left Germany in 1933 because he didn't like Schicklegruber—and has played only Nazi parts in movies. . . . Jean Gabin, originally a song and dance man in Paris, France, sings for the first time in an American movie. He does an American version of an old French folk song, "In Sweet Cherry Time." . . . The Gabins have been vaudeville performers clear back to great, great grandfather Gabin who was the Barrymore of his day.

I SAW IT HAPPEN

A friend of mine in the Army Air Corps recently visited the Hollywood Canteen and danced with a delightful, dark-haired girl whom he suspected was an actress. Still, he wasn't sure.

The soldier was a confirmed jitterbug. So when the music got hotter, he offered to show his lovely young partner the newest steps. She watched him intently and conscientiously followed his lead. Considerably later he was chagrined to learn that she was one of the screen's finest dancers—Ann Miller.

Cincinnati, Ohio

SHOW BUSINESS

There isn't a better loved figure in show business than Eddie Cantor. Eddie started back in vaudeville, went on to the fabulous musicals of Ziegfeld and then to movies and radio. "Show Business" may not be exactly a biography of Eddie, but the resemblance is certainly more than coincidental. You'll see what I mean when I tell you the plot of the picture.

Eddie (Eddie Cantor) appears on amateur night at a burlesque show. The star of the show, a song and dance man named George (George Murphy), likes the little guy with the banjo eyes and gives him a helping hand. After the show they go out for a beer together and run into a sister act, Constance (Constance Moore) and Joan (Joan Davis). George falls in love with Connie, but he can't make anyone believe it's really love. He's been a wolf too long. Besides, there's the little matter of Georgia (Nancy Kelly), the burlesque queen, who considers that she took out an option on George some time ago.

Eventually, however, George, Eddie, Connie and Joan get together in a vaudeville act. The act does pretty well. In fact, the foursome manages to save up $5,000. So what happens? Georgia gets in an auto accident, needs five grand for plastic surgery, and George sends her their savings.

Connie takes that like a good sport. She even marries George right afterward. But a year later, on the night her baby is born dead, George is out with Georgia. Connie won't listen to any explanation. She leaves the act and goes off on her own. The first World War is in progress, and George enlists. Eddie, too, goes overseas as an entertainer. When they come back, the great Ziegfeld hires them for his new show. He includes Connie and Joan in the deal, too. But Georgia interferes again, and it takes a second World War to get the right people back together.

There's lots of nostalgia in "Show Business." Old songs like "It Had to Be You" and "Whoopee" brings the memories flocking. For the kids who are just making their memories now, there are a couple of shiny new hits—"You May Not Remember" and "All for The Love of You."

Cantor's nose to the grindstone all during production, made him learn to dance, kept him working until nine o'clock some nights, excused him on Wednesdays so he could work on his radio show. . . . To those folks who seem to recall seeing Eddie dance, he explains, "I never really danced— You can't do everything so I concentrated on singing and comedy—all the dancing I've ever done has been kind of a shuffle." . . . Eddie was so thrilled about making this picture, he isn't back to normal yet. Did everything but record the sound—wrote, acted, produced, sang, sparked gags. Director Eddie Marin acted as a cool foil to Banjo-eye's excitability, was often pointed out to selected visitors as he sat toward the back of the theater set muttering, "It's a wonder they even let me in!" On stage, Cantor put the cast through its paces—Joan Davis and George Murphy and Connie Moore—rehearsed new breaks with dance director Nick Castle. . . . Because the picture is a glorified Cantor biography, five of the musical numbers are nostalgic—("Dinah," "I Want a Girl Just Like the Girl, etc.," "Whoopee"). Three of the songs are brand new. . . . Halfway through production, the time of year rolled around for the annual March of Dimes. Cantor flew to San Francisco, did a 24-hour marathon broadcast, sold $37,000,000 worth of War Bonds, returned the next day and went right to work again. Day included a long, impromptu speech delivered ad lib at luncheon given him in RKO commissary. . . . Joan Davis was voted the nation's "Queen of Comedy" last year, rates tops as radio comedienne in every survey and poll yet taken. . . . Eddie's own choice for "the two best men I ever knew in show business" are Will Rogers and George M. Cohan, considers "Cohan" a synonym for "dynamo." Says there is no truth to the rumor that vitamins take him.

GREENWICH VILLAGE

Don't think for a minute that the battle between the "long hairs" and the "hep cats" began in the Benny Goodman era. It was going strong back in the Twenties, and for the purpose of this picture the battleground is Don Ameche—in Technicolor. Don plays a young composer from Kansas, Kenneth Harvey, who has written a Concerto. Don is strictly the Philharmonic type, but he wanders into a Greenwich Village speakeasy one night, and the groove boys catch up with him.

He has his fortune told by Querida (Carmen Miranda), who sees several hundred dollar bills in his wallet. She promptly introduces him to Danny (William Bendix) the proprietor of the place. "A millionaire sucker," thinks Danny, and tries to interest Ken in backing a show to be called the Greenwich Village Gaieties. Ken meanwhile has gotten a look at Danny's featured attraction, a young singer named Bonnie (Vivian Blaine). From then on he doesn't hear a word Danny's saying.

Bonnie persuades Ken to play his Concerto at a party that night. "The gang" are bored silly, but just the same the next day they find themselves humming passages from it. "We might use some of that in the Greenwich Gaieties," Danny suggests. Hofer (Felix Bressart), a former symphony violinist, pretends to be shocked by this. He "cons" Ken into thinking he can get the Concerto played at Carnegie Hall for the trifling sum of 4,000 smackers. That, by an odd coincidence, being all that Ken has.

Meanwhile, Bonnie is writing lyrics for those tuneful passages, hoping Ken will let them use the music in the show. Danny raises money for the Greenwich Gaieties by giving a huge costume ball. You'll love that—it's the whole spirit of the 1920's in one colorful scene.

You'll have to go and see the picture to find out who wins the battle for Don's music. But I'll give you a hint—you'll come out whistling "Whispering." "Greenwich Village" is a gay, sparkling show that dates back to the speakeasy era—and you don't have to "know Joe" to get in!—20th-Fox.

P. S.

Carmen Miranda was a sick chick when production began. She was still recuperating from a critical operation that had her just this side of death's door for many long weeks. . . . Bill Bendix managed somehow to squeeze this particular film into his frantically busy schedule because he felt he should make one frivolous picture to counterbalance the grim roles he's been playing. Sings "A Pretty Girl is Like a Melody" and gets mixed up in a burlesqued adagio routine. . . . Femme singing star Vivian Blaine is the cream skimmed from the top of a list of 40 promising gals, all of whom were definitely candidates for the role. Vivian won only after she came out ahead of four other finalists in exhaustive and exacting Technicolor tests that lasted for hours. Each girl had to sing the same song, act out precisely the same scene. Their tests were voted on by a board of studio executives. . . . Alice Faye was originally scheduled to play the star role, had to withdraw when the stork was sighted winging over the horizon. . . . Newcomer to the comedian division is B. S. Pully. To those who don't know him, he's best described as having a voice that's a cross between Andy Devine's and Donald Duck's. And he looks just like he sounds. . . . Some of the sassier caricatures lining the walls of the sets are the work of Director Walter Lang, who studied art for years here in this country and abroad. . . . Lang whipped them up between scenes. . . . Dance scenes had to capture the spirit of the '20s, so the rug-cutters had to be watched to see that no jitterbugging slipped in. . . . Leo Robin and Nacio Herb Brown wrote ten new songs for this one, but the theme number is an oldie, "Whispering."

I SAW IT HAPPEN

I was invited to tag along with some newspapermen a while ago to a reception given in honor of Ernst Lubitsch. When the introductions were over, my friends parked me in a chair and went their rounds of picture-snapping, etc., while I, usually so at ease, sat there, conspicuously alone. A lovely-looking girl came into the room, waded through the mob to a vacant chair beside mine. "Are you saving this chair for someone?" she asked. "Nope," I said. "That's a serviceman's ring, isn't it," she asked, pointing to the Air Force ring on my finger. Warmed by her friendliness, I blurted out, "Yes, my fiancé. I was just sitting here thinking of these people cocktailing while he's on his way overseas." My new friend was completely sympathetic. "My husband's been overseas for months," she confided. "May I show you his picture?"

Later, when my friends returned, I asked, "Who is that girl. She was charming to me." "Oh, her . . ." they laughed. "She's nice to everyone. That's Carole Landis."

JAM SESSION

When Columbia named this one "Jam Session," they weren't kidding. The 'gators will be hanging from the chandeliers when they dig the bands in it—Charlie Barnet, Louis Armstrong, Alvino Rey, Jan Garber, Glen Gray and Teddy Powell. Plus the Pied Pipers and Nan Wynn. It's solid jaboo and plenty of it.

Somewhere along in the picture a writer in search of a plot says triumphantly, "The Cinderella angle! It's been done a million times, but it's still good!" It must be good, because it's the basis for "Jam Session." It's what they hang the music onto. Little girl comes to Hollywood, gets kicked around, finally succeeds. Doesn't sound like much when you put it that way, does it? Let's dress it up a little . . .

A pretty tap dancer from Waterfall, Kansas (does anyone ever stay in Kansas?), comes to Hollywood to get in the movies. It ought to be easy—she has a letter from the movie critic of the "Waterfall Tribune" to Mr. Stuart head of Superba studios. The tap dancer's name is Terry, and she is played by Ann Miller. (See, it's getting better already!) Terry finds that she can't get within even carrier pigeon distance of Mr. Stuart—who doesn't see anybody. Every time she makes a try at getting into his office, she lands on some set and ruins the "take." She is soon the most unpopular girl in Hollywood. Only a kind old gentleman she meets in the park will have anything to do with her.

Then she gets a job as secretary to a writer, George Haven (Jess Barker). George has been hired by Superba to write a picture, but all he has so far is the title "Jam Session." He can't think of any plot—which is just as well from Terry's point of view, since she can't even type. But eventually she weakens and suggests he write a story about a little dancer who tries to crash the movies. The story turns out fine. "Type it and send it to Mr. Stuart," George says proudly and goes out. Not knowing that Terry can't take dictation either, and that not a word he's given her has landed on paper. George gets fired by Superba, Terry lands in jail. But the old gentleman in the park intervenes at the right time, and the little girl from Waterfall gets not only a job, but a husband. No wonder nobody stays in Kansas!—Col.

P. S.

Jess Barker sets some new kind of record in films by doing a double double-take in one scene. As "George Carter Haven," he passes a motion picture theater that has a large 3-sheet featuring "Jess Barker in his Greatest Picture, coming to this theater soon." "Must be somebody I know," says Barker. "Must be," replies his picture in the lobby. Then both Barkers do double takes. . . . Some of the scenes for the picture were shot just outside the studio. Director Charles Barton tried to persuade "Cap," Taylor Duncan, to play himself as man-in-charge-of-admitting-people, but "Cap" refused, asked only that he be allowed to choose the actor who would impersonate him. "Cap" explained he liked his job too well, had been at it a long time and didn't want to change now at this late date. . . . Poor Director Barton had an accident that resulted in an eye infection, result being he had to work with one eye completely swathed in bandages, and the other aching sympathetically. . . . Ann Miller sent jigsaw puzzles of a picture of herself to the boys in service who wrote to her, now carries on a hilarious correspondence with some of them who complain they didn't get enough parts to make a complete picture. . . . For the band fans, "Jam Session" assembled Charlie Barnet, Louis Armstrong, Alvino Rey, Jan Garber, Glen Gray, Teddy Powell with their respective aggregations, worked them into the story and devoted 40 minutes of the entire film's running time to musical numbers. . . . Niftiest dance routine by Ann is called "The Victory Polka," shows the Miller gal at her fastest —which is faster than machine gun fire according to latest tap-versus-gun tests.

THE COWBOY AND THE SENORITA

You know what I'd like to hear? Roy Rogers serenading Trigger with a rendition of "Mairzy Doats." But Roy is not one to be serenading horses when there are lovely ladies around to sing to. In this case, the object of his songs is a fair señorita named Ysobel Martinez (Dale Evans). Ysobel owns the big Martinez ranch. She has a ward, a cute but troublesome youngster known as Chip (Mary Lee). As the picture opens, the whole countryside is engaged in a search for Chip, who has disappeared. Roy and his friend Teddy Bear (Guinn Williams) are returning from an unsuccessful gold hunting expedition, and they join in the search. Teddy Bear grabs a big roast chicken from the ranch house kitchen as they start out, and this acts as "bait" for Chip. She has run away, planning to search an old mine her father left her for buried treasure. But when she gets a whiff of the roast chicken, she walks right up to Roy and Teddy Bear and asks for white meat, please.

Chip has an idea that her new friends are trustworthy, so she confides that she is sure there is something valuable hidden in that mine. Ysobel thinks that's ridiculous, and tomorrow on Chip's sixteenth birthday the mine is to be sold to a man named Allen. Roy has met Allen and doesn't think much of him. He agrees to help Chip in her search. Before they can begin, Allen and a posse ride up and accuse Roy and Teddy Bear of having kidnaped Chip.

Eventually they get that straightened out and go back to the Martinez ranch, where Ysobel gives them a job. Chip persuades them to go to the old mine with her, and there she finds a letter hidden in a box in the ground. The letter is from her dead father and says, "To be opened on your sixteenth birthday." So Chip decides to wait till next day.

But there are a lot of other people interested in getting that letter. And in getting Roy and Teddy Bear out of the way. The result is a false charge of robbery and a lot of highly suspicious activity around the old mine, culminating in a hell-for-leather ride to the county judge's office. Chip does all right, as a result, and when last seen, Roy was still singing songs to Ysobel.—Rep.

P. S.

First picture co-starring Roy with Dale Evans. They work so well together, studio hopes to do a series of movies with them. . . . Radio listeners know Dale from her work as vocalist on Edgar Bergen's weekly Java show. Gave up air-lane work temporarily to concentrate on a picture career. To servicemen, she's well known as a song writer, most popular of the many original songs she warbles for them at camp shows being "Will You Marry Me, Mr. Laramie?" As the señorita in this picture, she adds dancing to her list of entertaining talents, whirls through some fancy Spanish numbers with the greatest of ease. . . . Between scenes, Roy practiced on his gee-tar and read and reread Roy Rogers Comics, a brand new comic magazine featuring adventures of Roy and Trigger. He's mighty proud of the book. . . . Trigger took an instant liking to the new assistant director on the picture, refused to leave his side between scenes. . . . Much of the sound had to be re-done after the picture was finished. Mary Lee had a severe cold during production, and her voice, they discovered later, had changed in tone from one scene to the next as her cold had improved. . . . Roy is trying to figure out a logical way to get his racing pigeons into his next picture. He took 28 more prizes with them during production, puffs up like one of them when he tells other members of the cast how smart they are. . . . After seeing the rushes of the picture, Dale's friends tried to persuade her to dye her honey-blond hair to match the black wig she wears—it's so becoming. . . . Valley residents, used to seeing 'most anything with three motion picture studios in their back yards, still do double takes in Roy's direction when he zooms through town on his motorcycle dressed in those wild cowboy shirts, chaps, ten-gallon hat and, over it all, his raincoat. (Because of heavy dew, not rain!)

HOME IN INDIANA

"By popular demand" is a much abused phrase, but this is one time when it really applies. By popular demand, young Lon McCallister has been given the starring role in a picture, and it's a honey! You know about Lon. You saw him in "Stage Door Canteen," and it was love at first sight. Now you'll see him as a boy who is a natural handler of horses, in an absorbing story of trotting races and a "phantom filly."

The boy is Sparke Thornton, who, at 19, comes to live with his uncle, 'Thunder Bolt (Walter Brennan). Sparke is a surly, suspicious lad at first, but he is soon disarmed by the casual friendliness of Thunder and his sister, Penny (Charlotte Greenwood). He loves horses better than anything, and when he finds that only a high fence separates him from the luxurious paddocks and blooded trotters of Godaw Boole, he knows he is here to stay.

There is a feud of years' standing between Thunder and Boole (Charles Dingle). So Sparke can't just go calling. Instead he climbs over the high fence and comes down, to his appalled terror, in the stall of Hamilcar Chief, a man-killing stallion. There is a spine-chilling moment, with the stallion screaming and stomping. Then gradually as Sparks stands there, not moving a muscle, the horse relaxes. Sparke has proved he's a horse handler. As a result he gets a job exercising Boole's horses, unknown to Thunder. He meets Boole's daughter, Cri-Cri (June Haver) and the trainer's daughter, Char (Jeanne Craine), who become rivals for Sparke without his realizing it.

Soon he has another secret to keep. Because one dark night, Sparke has led Hamilcar Chief into the stable of Lady, Thunder's blind thoroughbred mare. The foal which is on the way will have one of the best blood lines in the state.

Maudeen IV arrives at last—as sweet a filly as you ever saw. Thunder knows the secret by now, of course, and has forgiven Sparke. He even teaches him, as Maudeen grows older, to drive her with the true science of trotting races. "Some day," says Sparke dreamily, "Maudeen and I will win the Hambletonian." "You've got a long way to go," Thunder tells him gruffly, and Sparke learns that he is right. The trotting races will pull you right out of your seat—don't miss "Home in Indiana."—20th-Fox.

P. S.

Picture marks Lon McCallister's last film before reporting for induction in the United States Army. During production, Lon tried hard to do a good job, so he'd be fixed in the public's mind for the duration. Saved every bit of his salary, outside of incidental expenses, so he could buy a home for his folks before he actually received his draft notice. . . . A drama of the peace-time world, the government felt this film really presented an excellent view of the values our men are fighting for and rushed prints of the picture overseas long before it was released in this country. . . . Charlotte Greenwood gets a long-awaited chance to go dramatic. Spent her spare time between scenes teaching younger cast members new jitterbug steps for the ballroom scene. . . . Young Jeanne Crain is getting "the works" in publicity build-ups by 20th Century-Fox as a result of her ability in the drama department. Is set to be starred in her second picture. . . . Jeanne and Lon spent two weeks visiting a Santa Barbara ranch so they could learn the proper manner of driving trotting horses. . . . When the cast went on location—54 days were spent in the Midwest—all non-working days were spent drumming up trade at local War Bond rallies. Visits to Fremont and Marion, Ohio, and Lexington, Kentucky, boosted sales way over the local quota. One manufacturer pledged to buy $100,000 worth when Ward Bond auctioned off his coat. . . . Entire cast also visited military hospitals and war plants. . . . Nationally known horseman Paul E. MacPherson did a great deal of the technical advising—he's a specialist in every phase of racing. . . . Director Henry Hathaway put up a $1,000 purse for what he called the "Twentieth Century-Fox Stakes" and asked some of the drivers from the actual Grand Circuit to stay over a day to record a race sequence. The men gladly climbed back onto their "bikes" and gave out with a race that hasn't been equaled for realism since the chariot rush in "Ben Hur." Autumn came too soon to please the Technicolor experts. They had to send back to Hollywood for a couple of barrels of green paint, then spray the surrounding grass and trees back to their spring tones. . . . Maudeen Four, leading equine character, is really Miss Sarah Abbey, a 3-year-old trotter owned by Walter J. Michaels. Miss Sarah got a two-months' trip to Hollywood out of the deal, to complete added scenes, and was praised by one and all for her gentleness and fine temper.

THE HOUR BEFORE THE DAWN

Franchot Tone is turning out to be a very versatile lad these days. It's quite a jump from the wolf he played in "True to Life" to a conscientious objector working on a farm in England. But that's his role in this new picture, and he handles it well. Veronica Lake plays a young German spy ensconced in an English household, with equal effectiveness.

The household is that of General Heatherton (Henry Stephenson) and his two sons, Jim (Franchot Tone) and Roger (John Sutton). The spy is Dora Bruckmann, who poses as a Nazi-hating refugee. She is secretary-companion to Roger's giddy wife, May (Binnie Barnes). May is romantically trying to promote a marriage between Jim and Dora. "They're so sweet together!" she sighs ecstatically. But Dora, for the present, isn't interested in marriage.

Jim has hated any sort of killing ever since, as a boy, he accidentally shot his dog. When war breaks out, he declares himself a conscientious objector to the horror of his military-minded family. He moves to a small cottage nearby and goes to work on a farm. His brother Roger becomes a flight commander in the R.A.F. in charge of a nearby secret airfield.

Dora's job is to tip off the Nazi fliers to the whereabouts of that field. But too soon for her plans, she is told that because she is classed as an enemy alien, she may be moved out of that district. Immediately, her attitude toward Jim's devotion changes. She becomes much more responsive than usual, and after a few meetings at his tiny cottage, they decide to be married. When the order comes for the evacuation of enemy aliens, Dora is safely Mrs. James Heatherton, British citizen.

But now odd things begin to happen. The headlights of May's car are mysteriously left burning during an air raid. Jim calls on a suspiciously Nazi-sounding "professor" and finds some of Dora's special pastries on the tea tray. So the tension mounts, slowly and tightly, to the violent explosion which forms the picture's climax.—Par.

P. S.

This is Veronica's first attempt at dialect. Speaks with a German accent in every scene. Dialect coach Lester Sharpe had Veronica read newspaper columns to him with a heavy German accent to train her for this. . . . Pay special attention to Veronica's hats—she designed them all herself, including making the wire forms for them. . . . While on location in Mesa, Arizona, she found her first pet: a stray Persian cat with seven toes which she brought home with her. . . . Desert climate was so hard on her delicate skin she had to change from make-up powder to baby talcum. . . . Binnie Barnes' fans will love this one. Binnie, once an English vaudeville singer, croons "The Beer-Barrel Polka." Miss Barnes confesses she was known as "Texas Binnie Barnes," twirled a rope and sang cowboy ballads on the London stage. . . . Little David Leland is introduced to movie-goers in "The Hour Before the Dawn." His English accent is natural although David has never been in England. Born in Italy he moved with his English mother and American father to France while still small. Picked up his accent from the English school children who were his classmates before the German invasion. . . . More than a thousand people had to be transported to and housed in Mesa during the four-week location trip. Transportation department finally got buses for the cast and crew, but it was more difficult to find sleeping accommodations. Problem was solved when the residents of Mesa offered to rent their spare rooms and extra beds to the studio. . . . Some of the Mesans were so interested in the shooting of the outdoor scenes, they brought pillows and blankets and stood watching far into the night while camera crews worked filming explosions and fires in the Arizona fields. . . . Neatest trick on location was making an English farmhouse out of a 'dobe cottage. This was done by making a thatched roof out of hay which was to be used in the fire scenes next day.

EVE OF ST. MARK

You know how soldiers gather on street corners in New York, discussing where to go next. Here are three of them. One, Mulveroy (Michael O'Shea) from Brooklyn, of course wants to see the Dodgers play. The tall Southerner, Marion (Vincent Price), who loves poetry and liquor, wants to head for the nearest bar. And Quizz West (William Eythe) would like to look over Radio City. So they head their separate ways, and when they get together again back at camp, Quizz is in love. "In love as none ever was before," he says and means it.

The girl is from his home town upstate, but he hadn't seen her for years. Ran into her on the tour of Radio City. So now she's in love, too. "Yes, but you'll be shipped overseas soon. What about that?"

Marion asks. "She'll wait." Quizz is sure about that. Just thinking about Janet does things to his breathing apparatus. He writes to her every day.

But you can't sit around camp, thinking and writing letters every night. Sometimes you have to go into town with the boys. Marion always heads for the nearest place where they make with the bottles. Mulveroy heads for the nearest babe. Blonde, brunette or redhead, it's all one to Mulveroy. Sometimes Quizz gets to wondering if Janet really loves him as much as he thinks. He momentarily considers trying Marion's system—or Mulveroy's. But he doesn't do it. And when he gets a final furlough before being shipped out, he's glad he hasn't. Because Janet does love him—just as deeply and passionately as he loves her.

Later, on that little island in the far Pacific, the memory of Janet seems extraordinarily real, even in the midst of Jap bombs and malaria. When there is at last a final, fatal decision to be made, Janet in some curious reverse fashion, teaches Quizz the way to make it.

Twentieth Century-Fox has given us a deeply moving war picture from the famous Maxwell Anderson drama. The whole cast gives a touchingly real interpretation, with Vincent Price particularly good as Private Marion.—20th-Fox.

P. S.

Story behind the sale of this particular literary property is an interesting glimpse into studio negotiation routines. Author Maxwell Anderson wrote his play two years ago, sent it to 20th Century-Fox to see if they wanted to buy it for a movie. Darryl F. Zanuck offered to finance the play (if Anderson would take it to Broadway), paying $50,000 down and $3,000 for every week the play ran. Anderson thought carefully, reasoned the play must be better than he had realized, decided to finance it himself. When it proved to be a smash hit, Anderson was offered $300,000 for the movie rights by four different studios. Fox was one of them, and he sold it to 20th because they had been interested in it originally. . . . Producer William Perlberg assigned George Seaton (who scripted "Song of Bernadette") to do the writing of their screen version and then cast the picture with an eye to actors' ability rather than their box-office pull . . . . Heroine Anne Baxter passes along her recipe for adding inches to her height. Originally 5 feet 3 inches, she reaches for the molding above her bedroom door and hangs on daily from one to three minutes, now comes up to the 64 inch mark on the scale in the studio gym. . . . Bill Eythe has been turned down by every branch of service because of broken ear drums, originally shattered in a childhood accident and later aggravated by nightly beatings in the stage version of "The Moon Is Down." He was Lt. Tonder. . . . Vincent Price, now in service himself, found out all he could about things military during production, because he had a hunch he'd be called quite soon.

TRUSHAY* . . . THE "BEFOREHAND" LOTION

Smooth it on before you tackle daily soap-and-water jobs! Helps keep busy hands soft!

A marvelously different idea in lotions! Trushay, used before you wash undies—before you do dishes—guards smooth, white hands. Helps prevent soap-and-water damage, instead of trying to correct it after it's done. This rich, creamy lotion's grand for all-over body rubs, too—soft and soothing for chapped elbows and knees. Trushay's economical, so you can use it all these ways. Ask for it today —at your favorite drug counter.

*Trushay was formerly called Toushay. A different spelling —but the same wonderful "beforehand" lotion.

Co-ed

What's your problem? How to be smooth as a kitten's ear? How to land HIM? Army wife blues? V-mail complications? We've got the answer!

Gosh, it's a beautiful feeling to get lots and lots of mail, and don't think we aren't happy about all those letters you've written us. The cute, jivey scrawls from you school gals; the sweet, serious notes from service wives; the neatly-typed jobs from careerists . . . We love 'em all, so keep them coming and we'll keep answering.

Funny how many of you have the same problems. Men, babies, stuff. Some questions popped up in our mail so persistently that we decided to turn this "Co-Ed" into a question and answer session. Okay?

"I'm madly in love with a boy in my class, but he doesn't know I'm alive. I'm not beautiful, but I'm not bad. How can I get him to ask me out?" A. R., Pelham, N. Y.

It may be a long hard pull, but if you'll just polish up your perseverance, we'll bet you'll get that date. First of all stop whispering about him to the other girls. Let everyone forget you have a crush on him. Once he knows you're on his trail, you've practically struck out. Now let's take stock of yourself. Are you the cutest gal in the class? You can be if you work at it. How is your hair—clean and bright? So attractively arranged that the guys turn around and look and then look again? And your skin—is it petally? If you wear make-up, are you an artist at it? Then how's the figure? Too much in the wrong places? Uh uh. You'll never sell him a bill of goods if you're chubby. Exercise, chum. Then work on your clothes. Be sure they're spotless and well-fitting. Neither too short nor too long, too young nor too old. So far so swell. Now that you look smooth as a kitten's ear, turn on the charm. We know it's awfully hard to be casual with someone you like a lot, but you can do it with practice. Instead of flying past him in the hall, dropping books in your excitement, toss him a big grin and a "Hi, Bob." Have something interesting to say when you're asked to recite in classes you have with him. If he says anything the least bit praiseworthy in said classes, smile at him and tell him afterwards he was really mellow. If he's in the Dramatic Club, join it. If he's an athlete, go see him play. Ask him to your parties, but not as your date. Pursue him, but subtly, and not with a pack of equally smitten women at your heels. Above all, forget the gal you used to be. The tongue-tied one with the blah hair-do. Don't ever let that character cramp your style. You're the cutest gal in the class, remember? Now go get your man. P.S.—Send for our charts (see page 18) if you want some good substantial ammunition for the campaign. Then watch out. Lady, you'll be

"How does one cope with mothers? Mine still considers me an infant, although I'm fifteen. She won't let me have dates, wear make-up or choose my own clothes. I'm slowly going mad. What do you suggest?" —Molly J., Ridgewood, N. J.

How about a conference between you and Mom at which you both air your views? Be sure you have yours all neatly arranged in your head so that when you sound off you make sense. Listen patiently to her side, then have her listen to yours. If, when you've finished, she's still unconvinced, at least get her to compromise a bit and tackle her again in a month or so. Some points for your side of the debate are these. Eventually you hope to get married, and even at this early age you should be gathering experience to help you know what sort of man you want. Settle for house dates or double dates or anything she'll agree to along these lines. About make-up. Her unfavorable reaction to it dates way back to an era when only the most tarnished ladies wielded a lipstick. In those days, you were terribly conspicuous if you even put a dab of rice powder on the old schnoz. Now quite the reverse is true. Subtle skillful make-up is as socially acceptable as a Mayflower descendant, and really, by the time you're in your middle teens, you're a bit conspicuous without it. Lipstick is the most important item, so get her to agree to a rosy pomade at first. Later, wheedle her into approving a good true-red lipstick. Now about selecting your own clothes. Let her see how smooth your taste is, first making sure it is. Show her clothes that you like in magazines and newspapers. Discuss the new spring things you'd like to have with her, and if your taste is as good as we think it is, we think she'll let you do your own selecting. If you want to please Mom—and incidentally, the rest of your public—steer clear of frills for school. Stick to good-looking sweaters and skirts and blouses, with an occasional tailored dress. For dates, avoid too-tight numbers, too-low ones and over-fussy jobs. In the coat line, go for the classics every time.

"For once, I'm completely stumped. My husband is in an Army camp, and I have a furnished room in the nearest town. Can you possibly suggest any arrangement at all whereby we can read or chat in the evening without disturbing our six-months-old baby?"—Jane, Trenton, N. J.

Your problem's a pretty universal one, Jane, and here's the way a lot of girls are working it out. Push the crib against the wall farthest from where you plan to sit. Then get two folding screens from a second hand store or by advertising for them in the local paper. Arrange them around the crib so that it is walled off completely. If the light that shines over the screens is disturbing, drape a large sheet over them, roof-wise. If you have time and inspiration, the screens can be made awfully attractive by pasting baby pictures all over them and shellacking them with colorless shellac. Naturally, you'll talk softly, and as an extra precaution you can put cotton in your baby's ears, if your doctor says okay.

"I've gone with a boy for ages, but he just never seems to get around to proposing. I imagine he considers us engaged, for he sees no other girls and I date no other boys, but the word marriage is never mentioned. He has a good job and no ties. How can I make him propose?"—J. B., Waterloo, Iowa.

Sounds like your little man is in a nice comfortable rut, and he needs a good jolt. Next time you see him, pepper your conversation with the name of an imaginary man your sister or crony has introduced you to. Discuss him sort of dreamily, laugh a little over funny things he said or did. Scare your Butch but good. It may take a week or two of this routine, but if his intentions are serious, by gad he'll make them known pretty soon. This is surefire stuff, and if it doesn't get a rise out of him, resign yourself to the knowledge that marriage isn't on his mind.

"I just got a letter from my favorite corporal, now in Italy, and it's kind of worried me. He says, 'A pal of mine who was practically engaged to a gal back home just married a WAC. The jilted dame, a cute bit of fluff according to her pictures, had been writing him silly, spineless letters for weeks, and he got fed and married this hard-boiled little sergeant. Says he's outgrown the ex-heart-throb. Gosh, darling, that couldn't happen to us, 'cause I'm so sure you're growing up as much as I am.' Oh, golly. I want to, but I'm not very sure what he means."—Betty W., Madison, Wis.

He's grown up, he says, and naturally you wonder how. Having talked to a number of World War II veterans, maybe we can shed some light. That corporal of yours cares less about superficialities, more

I SAW IT HAPPEN

Last summer when Sammy Kaye was in New York, he devoted part of his program to a contest called, "So You Want to Lead a Band!" I was chosen with three others to conduct the orchestra and, probably with the help of my Navy uniform, snagged first prize consisting of five dollars, an autographed baton and a pass to the theater. Well, this winter my ship was torpedoed during the North African campaign, and I lost the autographed baton. Afterwards, when I returned home on leave, Sammy Kaye was playing at the Essex House. I visited him one evening and told him how disappointed I was in losing the baton. He promptly gave me another and, later in the evening, came over to our table to chat with my friends and me. He sure is one swell guy!

We're Upping the Ante from $1.00 to $5.00

Frankly we love gossip. With greatest relish we dive into the mail each day, pore over your intimate little stories of stars and finally settle on the best four or five to be printed in MODERN SCREEN each month. We think these true experiences with Hollywood people are bright spots in the magazine. And, too, we think that perhaps you ought to be rewarded a little more generously for them. So, instead of sending you $1 for your letter if we use it, we're mailing you $5, beginning with this issue. (Unless a self-addressed, stamped envelope is enclosed we cannot return your letter.) Do write us. It's such a heck of a lot of fun hearing about the stars on Bond tours and vacation jaunts and other off-screen moments.

Below is one of this month's prize-winners.

I SAW IT HAPPEN

This scene, starring Mickey Rooney, took place in New York at 6th Ave. and 57th St. I saw a large mob of boys and girls running after a small but very agile figure as fast as their legs could carry them.

They were almost upon him when he made a sudden dash into a drugstore, sat down at the fountain and pretended he was one of the customers, but his trick was quickly discovered. He then ducked behind the counter and, on his hands and knees, crawled around to the back exit and made a leap for a taxi parked there. The fans saw him . . . . screamed "Hey, Mickey Rooney . . . wait!" . . . and the chase continued.

about essentials, and that goes for everything from women to a way of life. Sheer beauty of puss with nothing behind it, no longer cuts any ice with him. Give him a bright-eyed, shining-haired little riveter in a pair of overalls, or a freckle-faced lady Marine with a smudge of jeep grease on her nose. He wants, in words of one syllable, his girl to have helped him win the war. Take your cue from that. He also wants one who can talk to him about it when he gets back. Oh, maybe not right away. But some day when the pair of you are relaxed and close—sitting on the beach maybe or walking home from the movies —he'll begin to talk, and if you can answer him intelligently, really interestingly, he'll be so grateful. Get an atlas. Read the papers. Have a daily date with your favorite news commentator. Know what cooks and where and why. He wants a girl who is tender and sincere and capable. Courageous and unselfish. He wants a paragon, and boy he deserves one. Don't forget, he's seen gals cook and give transfusions and grin 200 yards back of the front lines. He's seen 'em putting on lipstick by the light of shell fire. He doesn't want to come back to a girl who can't boil an egg or darn a sock. That's your answer, Betty, now get busy and grow.

And the rest of you co-eds, get busy and write. No problems too big for us or too tiny. Want to know how not to get stuck at dances? How to write a love letter? When to let a boy kiss you good night. BEDSPREADS WITH MATCHING DRAPERIES

"Betcha my Socks it was my secret made Peg prettier!"

1

PEG IS MOMMY'S BEST FRIEND. Mine, too, I guess—she always brings me nice squashy animal toys. So one day I gave her a present—I plopped my pretty white cake of Ivory Soap smack into her hand. Mommy chuckled: "Maybe baby's trying to tip you off that her pure, mild Ivory is best for big girls' complexions, too!"

2

SO-O-O, PEG MET ANOTHER FRIEND OF MINE. My doctor. And what do you know! . . . He said: "Change to regular, gentle cleansings with pure, mild Ivory." 'Cause he knows you can't beat Ivory for purity! No wonder more doctors—like mine—advise Ivory Soap than all other brands together! . . .

3

THEN PEG GOT ANOTHER FRIEND! He's all hers! Just can't keep his eyes off her radiant new "Ivory Look." Golly, how he went for her soon after she switched to pure, mild Ivory cleansings. She's going to be Mrs. Lieutenant soon! Happy-making stuff, Ivory. For all us gals—from the romper to the rhumba set!

99 44/100 % pure . . . It floats.

Look lovelier with Ivory . . . the soap more Doctors advise than all other brands together!

SAVE SOAPS! THEY USE VITAL WAR MATERIALS!

1. DON'T LEAVE SOAP IN WATER when you're through lathering yourself. Put the bar in a soap-dish when not in use.
2. BE SURE YOUR SOAP-DISH IS DRY before you put your bar back. Keep a cloth handy to keep your soap-dish dry.
3. USE UP SOAP SCRAPS in wire shaker or tied in cloth. Or make soap jelly by dissolving scraps in boiling water.

Sylvia Katz catches a flying salami fragment in her eye, and Ann (Service Department) Ward operates right on the scene. Sylvia regained partial use of the eye after brief rest.

To the stately strains of Glenn Miller's lovely "It Must Be Jelly," Sylvia Katz and Bill Weinberger prepare to beat hell out of the rug!

To our Readers...

The gang at Modern Screen has itself a party . . . and quietly proceeds to tear the editor's house down.

Awful moment in an editor's life. Al Delacorte with the weight of the world (Bill) on his shoulders and plenty of trouble (Henry Malmgreen) on his hands.

Annette tells Bev (Information Desk) Linet's fortune. Handsome man in her life turns out to be merely a postman with flat feet from carrying all her mail.

At the height of the fracas, Al Jr., sits up in bed with a pistol-packin' look and says "Murder" he says!

Bill's old lady dropped him on his head when he was an itty bitty boy. Good old Bill. He hasn't changed a bit, has he?

Parcel from Nancy on fifth anniversary held record of Frank, Jr.'s howl. Commented Pop, "I don't know what it would do to the bobby sox, but it sure sends me!"

Boys at Canteen couldn't get enough of him. Soon after Swoonatra fever swept Coast, a phony Sinatra appeared in town, enjoyed gay whirl with lesser film actresses. Hoax wasn't unearthed until Barbara Hale, who had played opposite genuine article in "Higher and Higher," discovered his identity!

Hollywood Hate FRANK SINATRA?

Yep, they hate the guy the way you hate Porterhouse steaks, 2 inches thick, nylon stockings and a 10-day furlough for your private!

■ Want to go along to a broadcast of Frankie's, kids? Okay, don't knock me down. MODERN SCREEN has room for a million or so. All this and Frankie, too—for 15 cents.

That's CBS over there—with Bobby-sockers stretching from the door halfway round the block. They've had a long wait, some of 'em —camping since morning with their lunches and radios. But boy! what a claim they've staked out—seats in the first couple of rows —so close you can almost touch him—

"I'm so nervous," one sighs.

"What're you nervous about? You'll be the first one in."

"Oh, it isn't that. I'm always nervous Wednesday and Saturday."

The other nods an understanding head. "Who isn't?"

In Hollywood the first Hit Parade broadcast goes on at 6. The doors of Studio B are opened at 5:15. There's a mad scramble, but positively no squabbling. The kids play fair. They try for the best, and if they lose out, settle for what they can get. After all, they're sisters under the skin, and Frankie's the tie that binds them for the next 90 minutes—45 of anticipation, 45 of concentrated bliss. Bits of news comment fly back and forth—

"Last time he sang 'Night and Day' for an extra, and this great huge sigh went up, and he flapped his hand and said, 'Aaaw, shuddup—' He said it so *dar*ling—"

"You know that scar on his forehead? I read he got it when he was eight and another kid hit him with a milk bottle—"

"Oh, thank you. I've been dying to know the story behind that scar."

of the gray curtain they're rehearsing. Axel Stordahl leads the band. He's a Norseman and looks it. He's also Frankie's arranger and one of his closest friends.

Frank's at the mike—gray suit, gray sweater, black tie, white handkerchief, a tiny rose in his buttonhole. He looks fine and gay—always was a happy guy, even when he didn't have a swooner to his name.

The rehearsal's mostly for timing, so he doesn't give out with the voice. Right there on the stage you can hardly hear him, but all of a sudden there's that squeal from outside. They've caught a whisper. His shoulders hunch to his ears, and he tunes himself down. All through the rehearsal, he's clowning—can't keep his knees from jiggling or his shoulders from swinging to the beat—takes a couple of dance-steps, pops a stick of gum into his mouth (that's to keep his throat moist), wads up the paper and snaps it at Axel's bald spot. Axel's the tranquil type, goes right on conducting . . .

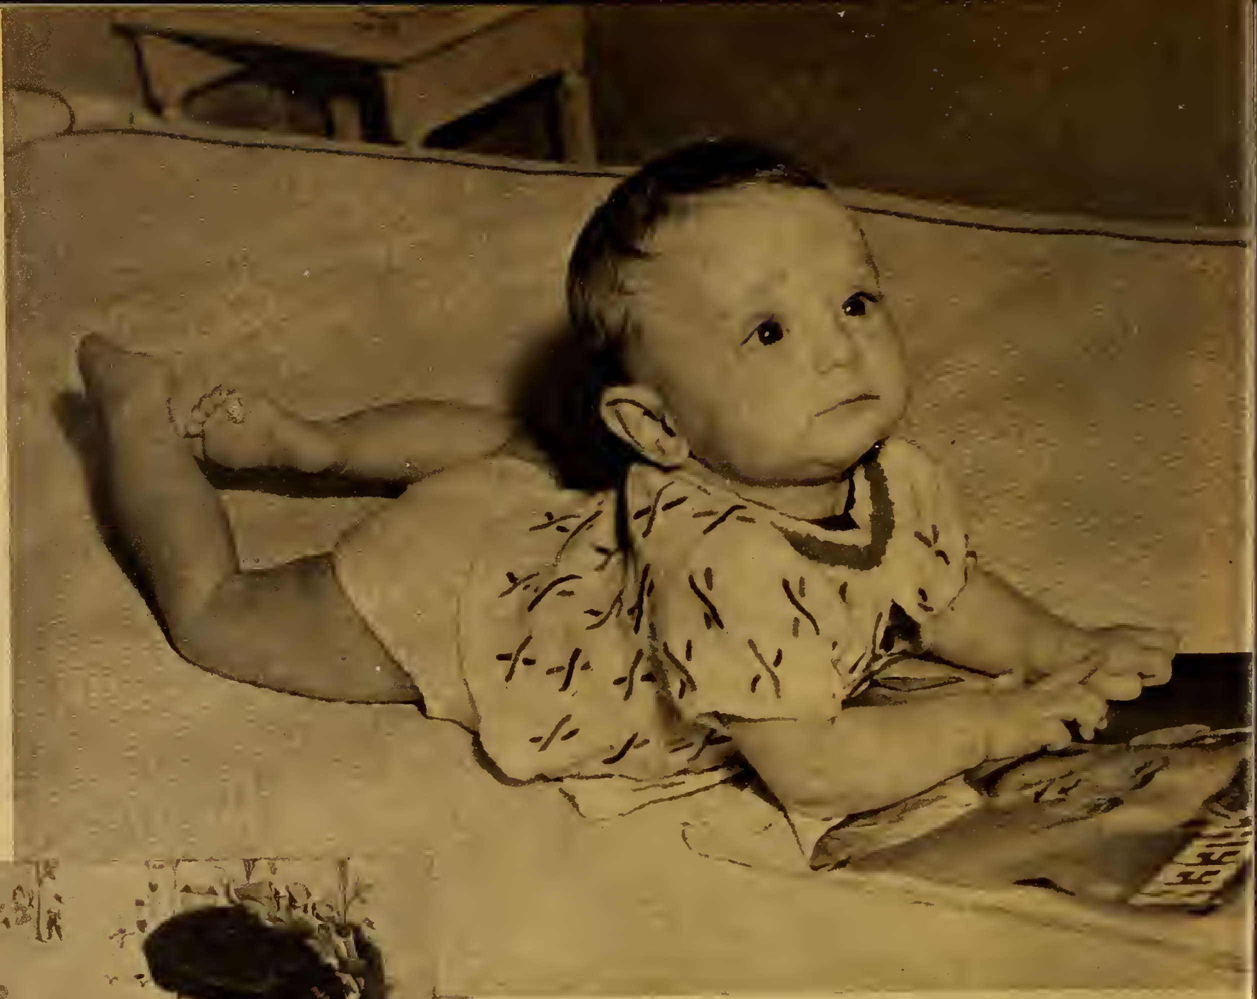
Sensational rumors hint The Voice will kiss his leading lady in "Manhattan Serenade." They also whisper he'll dance. Above, with Geo. Murphy.

Secretary is envy of Brigade. Works with him from 9:30 to 8 daily, and gets paid for it! Sinatra, shorter than she, nicknames her "Baby."

Does Hollywood Hate FRANK SINATRA?

Frank was first in line at Connie Haines' opening at Clover Club. They used to sing together with T. Dorsey. Whenever he cooks meals in apt., does own shopping!

No idle gossip in stories of staunch camaraderie between Crosby and Sinatra. There's not a speck of professional jealousy between them, and they've been practically inseparable ever since Frank's arrival in H'wood!



Alana Ladd, at 6 months, pulled 2500 fan letters a week! Like Pop, has murderous time bottling cold germs, recently had severe intestinal flu. Ladds report her down with the sniffles again.

When Laddie blondly announced that cook's tot had mumps, whole Paramount lot was thrown into jitters, afraid Alan might be spreading the germ. Sue and Alana remained unconcerned.

Careful count has Laddie's fan mail at 70,425 letters a month which is absolutely tops in movie history. When old stills of Ladd in "The Black Cat" were found, studio considered reissuing pic.

Sue calls her chubby young 'un Little-Gun-for-Hire, she's so like her Pop; same clear blue eyes, blonde hair, same level stare.

By Rosemary Layng

■ Alana Ladd's no dope. Her pop's the only person she'll kiss.

Her pop and her white felt kitten and herself in the mirror. Nothing and nobody else. She's on friendly terms with men, women and dogs, handing out an amiable, four-toothed grin to all comers. But ask for a kiss, and she'll shake her head. Persist, and you'll find a small hand shoved into your face. Even her well-beloved mum-mah gets the brushoff. On the principle, obviously, that where's the fun in kissing another girl?

But let Alan appear, and the lady's ready and willing. Tight round his neck go the arms—smack to the middle of his cheek goes the soft mouth. Then she draws back her head and crows, as though she'd done something truly remarkable. From the look in his eyes, her dad seems to agree with her.

This love affair started when (Continued on page 107)

Bendix rides pal mercilessly since day Laddie was trailed by bobby-sock crowd à la Sinatra. Bill, a fixture in Ladd pictures, will not appear in next.

Alan says minute he met Sue, work stopped being painful grind, started being fun. "And Now Tomorrow" was rolling smoothly until Laddie's recent illness.

At local radio station, Laddie used to rate $20 a week for 19 shows. Took all parts, from fish-peddler on down. Threw newscast into bargain. Summers, when radio was slow, Alan would shoulder a pick.

TERRIFIC TRIO!

They talk the same language, Lon and his buddies swallowing 3 lemon pies whole, harmoniously dating same girl, same night!

First night newly-inducted Lon was permitted to call home, he stood 70 minutes in downpour waiting his turn in phone booth. Mom read his mail over phone, upped his morale for days after.

The conveyance was a rather battered Buick coupe. In the front seat sat a chipper middle-aged man beside a pretty young woman. In the rumble seat sat a small, freckled-faced boy and a pretty bird-like middle-aged woman. The back seat was full of song. All the way across the United States and into Canada, dulcet notes were cast upon the summer air. Perhaps they weren't the hep stuff of the moment, but they had rhythm and melodic passages, and they were rendered with such zest as few songs are accorded. There was "After The Ball Is Over" and "Redwing." There was the Alphabet Song which is used in every nursery to teach future government employees their letters. There was "Frere Jacques" and "I Dreamt That I Dwelt In Marble Halls."

The singers were Lon McCallister and his grandmother, Mrs. Mary Goldia Hocking. The occupants of the front seat were Lon's mother, Mrs. Mary Madaline McCallister, and Lon's grandfather, Mr. Hocking.

That summer instituted a clanship between the four that is as strong and important today as the blood brothership between political bosses during an election year. But the purpose of the Hocking-McCallister machine are entirely benevolent . . . and musical.

With such a tuneful beginning, it was only natural that the partnership between Lon and the little woman he calls "Granny" should continue musically. When Lon decided that he wanted to learn to play the piano, Granny volunteered to give him his basic training. She used to be a Sunday School teacher, so she struck out with a fine ecclesiastical repertoire; first she taught Lon to play "Rock of Ages." That mastered, they moved on to "That Old Rugged Cross," then progressed to "Onward, Christian Soldiers." "You'd now be a credit to any Sunday School," complimented Granny. "And now you need greater scope."

So she taught him Chopin's "Minuet" and proceded to flabbergast the family by topping off this classic with an impressive playing of "Blue Moon." Lon, his hazel eyes

On induction eve, Lon and closest crony Bill Eythe held their own private farewell party, were out till the tiny hours visiting every night spot within a 20-mile radius of Beverly Hills. Above, in smile contest with Eythe, John Harvey.

Granny constantly stuffed his pockets with food, trying to get his 5' 6¼" frame above the 132-lb. mark. Last pic, "Home in Indiana."

One of toughest moments of parting was toking leave of Mac. When his bulldog Pat died, Lon and Mac held funeral ceremony, buried him on hillside overlooking the Pocific. Great Dane stood watch over grave of his friend for hours.

They agree on clothes, men, books! But no two women see eye to eye on everything—not even Veronica and her tiny tyke!

■ Miss Elaine Detlie was having her breakfast. She had reached that stage of development in which a junior citizen loiters from one delay to another. Having postponed each spoonful of cereal as long as possible, she suddenly thought of a new dodge—when her small mouth was full, she released the contents into her bowl.

Her mother removed the bowl and considered the situation. Then she telephoned the pediatrician who has cared for Elaine since her birth in August, 1941. "Thank you so much," she said at the end of her conversation, "I'll try that. I want to handle Elaine intelligently."

The next morning the cereal was placed before Elaine. She tried a few bites, then decided to play, so the bowl was removed. At luncheon, the selfsame gruel, warmed, was offered to her again. Somewhat nonplused, she took several bites, then spat it out. Veronica removed the dish, undressed the (Continued on page 85)

Since divorce, string of suitors trailing Veronica included Arthur Hornblow, Jr., Howard Hughes, super-smooth Jean Negulesco who popped up one day with $5000 diamond and ruby wristwatch.

Veronica, who nixed piano lessons when she was a kid, is beginning to brush up on scales again. (Above with Carol Ann Beery.) Upped weight to 106, gain of 24 lbs. in yr.

Veronica, currently in "The Hour Before Dawn," says, "John and I parted amicably. He's a fine fellow but we just don't think alike." Freak of the week: Allergy to orris root, which is base of theatrical make-up.

About Veronica, who once sold lock of hair on bond tour for $186,000, Frank Tuttle says, "She has temperament, a lovely face, and she's lazy —a female Bing Crosby." (Here with Rita Beery, whom she lives with.)

When Lake hair-do swept defense plants, managers feared dangling forelock would get enmeshed in machinery. War Production Board asked her to endorse safer pompadour.

Veronica hopes history won't be just so much castor oil to little Elaine when she's old enough to study it. Thinks maybe her breath-catching collection of historic dolls will bring textbooks alive.

See here, Mr. Walker...

Nobody could understand you as a kid, going AWOL from kindergarten, hopping freight cars out of town. But all you needed was a stage, lights, music!

Bob feels right at home in Private Hargrove's shoes. In fact, he was born to 'em. And it's not so long since he outgrew them that he can't still wriggle his toes comfortably within their familiar depths.

When "Bataan" was released, Salt Lake City and Ogden staged a hair-pulling match over whose local boy he was. The marquees read BOB WALKER and BOB TAYLOR in "Bataan." Mom and Dad were overwhelmed with attentions, and Dad had to take bows at the Rotary Club. Behind the glow of pride ran the bewildering vision of a skinny kid whose middle name was Trouble.

Aunt Tenny saw the picture in New York. Bob's Aunt Tenny is Mrs. Hortense Odlum of Bonwit Teller's. What Bette Davis is to pictures, that's what Mrs. Odlum is to department stores. With the strangers around her, she laughed and wept over the gangling sailor, (Continued on page 98)

Walkers' home life seemed ideal. Spurned night clubs to stay home with kids, study scripts together and hash over his amateur writing. Had mutual adoration for books, sports, their record collection

Jennifer was smitten first time she saw Bob at Academy of Dramatic Arts. Thought, "He's handsome. He's got Jimmy Stewart's charm and Fonda's comic flair, only more so!"

It Comes Up Marriage!

It was like being slapped on a merry-go-round that wouldn't stop.

So many things happened to Don in those three whirly days . . .

■ One recent Monday morning a puzzled gas station greaseball near Ventura, California, shook his head sadly as a skinny, dreamy-eyed young man whirled his car around and roared out of the drive.

"Look at that nutty Los Angeles kid," he confided to a customer. "He says, 'Is Fort MacArthur near here?' and already he's 40 miles out of his way and heading for San Francisco. The dope don't know which way is south!"

Later the same Monday a drill sergeant at Fort MacArthur had approximately the same idea about the same skinny, dreamy-eyed kid. The sarge was marching a bunch of rookies across the post, and when he called "Halt!" one rookie stopped two yards out ahead of the rest. "Right dress!" barked the (Continued on page 89)

On Larry (Dick Powell) and Sylvia Stevens' (Linda Darnell) golden wedding anniversary, they argue about a story she has made him keep secret for 50 years. It all happened this way—

It's the 1890's, and Larry is feting his cronies in celebration of his promotion to full-fledged "Evening News" reporter. Party winds up at tavern.

Entertainers are clairvoyant Cigolini (Jack Oakie) and his "medium" Sylvia, who are predicting future. Larry falls for Sylvia, interrupts act to wangle date for next afternoon.

It was incredible; it sounded as if they were arguing. Downstairs, in the large, gracious reception hall, the family looked at one another uncomfortably. They could hear the raised voices. Arguing. Grandma and Grandpa arguing? On their golden anniversary?

They weren't really arguing. After 50 years, they were too much in love for that. But she was saying: "Better not tell them. They won't believe it anyway."

"Won't believe it? But I tell you it happened. You know it happened."

"They won't believe you, Larry. No one believes in miracles any more."

"But it did happen," the old man said vehemently.

Later that night, newspaper veteran Pop Benson (John Philliber) appears in mist, hands Larry newspaper carrying stories of next day's events. He reads of opera house hold-up.

Snatching opportunity to cash in on advance news, he and Sylvia make beeline for opera house, arrive just as holdup comes off. He hands already written news item to his bewildered editor (Geo. Cleveland).

"It Happened Tomorrow"

Dick Powell found it tough, keeping up with tomorrow's headlines today . . . especially his own murder screamed across the front page!

"Don't you remember? Don't you remember, Sylvia?"

It wasn't hard to remember, not even though it had happened 50 years ago. Of course things were different then; the clothes they wore were different and the streets looked different; there were still horses and cabs clopping down the cobblestoned gutters, and gas lights flared on the street corners. Things were different in the 1890's . . .

They were drinking beer in the city room of "The Evening News," drinking beer and singing. Larry Stevens swung his glass in a high arc and toasted News—Today's, Tomorrow's, Yesterday's. Pop Benson, librarian, keeper of the "morgue," shuffled (Continued on page 93)

Disappointed bookie grabs wallet. Wild chase ensues, and afternoon papers run story of Larry's murder. Catch: identification papers found on thief's body belonged to Larry!

After reading second phantom edition, Larry leads police to bandits, then rescues Sylvia. When his own murder is headlined, he hurriedly weds Sylvia, piles up fortune at racetrack.

Two minutes later, police inspector (Edgar Kennedy) blusters into office, pinches Larry as accomplice in crime, jails him!

Sylvia claims she's "seer" who told him of robbery. Jumps in river to prove her supernatural powers!

Bing's swinging into 13th year at Par. with new 7-year contract that will rake in about $3,000,000 for him. In Dakar, his and Harry James' disks sell for $4 apiece.

Crew of "Crosby's Curse" (bomber) gave Bing copy of plane's log book. Captain who delivered it bunked with Crosbys over Xmas. Bing did recording of 7th Air Force Bomber Command Song but says lyrics are too virile to repeat!

Nobody ever got Bing to knock himself out working—not when he could play golf or clock bangtails. But, heck, you should see him now . . .

BING ON THE BEAM

• Bing Crosby was singing for the boys at the San Diego Naval Hospital when, out of the corner of his eye, he saw them wheel this wounded sailor out on a balcony.

He looked like a white mummy. He was petrified in a plaster cast from his hips to his eyes, and he was flat on his back all through the show. The sailor could hear Bing's melodies, but he couldn't see anything except the blue sky above. Bing Crosby took all this in, but he never said a thing until his act was over.

Then he picked up the mike and climbed to where the sailor was. "Maybe I don't improve the view," cracked Bing. "But anyway I can keep the sun out of your eyes. What'd you like to hear?" The sailor named a song and Bing sang it. "This one's for Johnny So-and-so"—naming the sailor—he told the crowd. He grinned down at the rigid gob.

"Say," Bing drawled, in that easy way of his and with those big, blue eyes wide and innocent, "How'd you like to step out and go dancing tonight—hey? Maybe I can line up a couple of babes. What you say we do the clip joints, kick up our heels—hey?"

That was just what the invalid sailor needed. Wrapped up in cold storage, he'd had enough tongue clucking and sympathy. He wanted a good old American good-natured razz, and nobody handed him one. He almost cracked his cast laughing, and Bing climbed down feeling happy as a lark with that laugh ringing for days in his wind-wing ears.

The Old Groaner has had plenty of thrills in his day. He's seen and done just about everything, when you look back. After all, Bing's raised a generation of young Americans on his croons, and he's still, as Dinah Shore states emphatically, "the singer than which there is nothing whicher!" Bing's a prize family man with a slew of husky offshoots— (Continued on page 79)

The Man in Deannas

It's strictly a case of leap year, the way she showers tiny Dickie with presents, flies out of the studio each night to steal a moment with him!

Before divorce, there was rumor floating around that Deanna had date with stork. Deanna received friends' queries wide-eyed, said story must have been started by shopping jaunts in baby depts. to pick up small items for nephew Dickie.

The chief man in Deanna Durbin's life at present is a personable gentleman named Dickie. He is three years old, chubby, curly-haired and inclined to refer to the love of his life as Aunty May Pole.

For his birthday, Aunty May Pole gave Dickie an athletic slide and a playhouse large enough for him to play commando in, around and about. It was set up in an unpainted condition. The intention was that Dickie and Deanna were to paint it on Sunday. When Sunday rolled around, however, Dickie had a cold, so had to remain indoors. The following Sunday it rained all day.

"While we're waiting for the weather to improve," Deanna told him, "we should decide what color to paint it."

Dickie is just learning the names of colors. He is fairly sure of red, and he appears to like yellow very well. "Red and yellow," he said, being prodigal with his knowledge.

"My favorite color for playhouses is white," admitted Aunty May Pole, being diplomatic.

"Then we'll paint it white," said her gallant nephew.

In addition to their exterior decorating conspiracy, Dickie and Deanna share an interest in music. When Deanna was working as an adolescent years ago, in a picture with Walter Pidgeon, he taught her a lullaby, a soft and lilting refrain which Deanna has now taught Dickie. He calls it the "Boo" song and demands a duet with Deanna the instant she steps into the house. His voice is true and his sense of rhythm and phrasing so developed that Deanna has already made arrangements with her own vocal teacher to give Dickie instruction as soon as he is old enough to understand written music. Meanwhile, Deanna is teaching him tune- (Continued on page 76)

Life

Riveting scene in "Hers to Hold" was shot at Vega plant on Sunday. Deanna's stand-in came in for kleig-light attention in own right, and D. did her own standing-in during film. During lunch tries to shut camera business out of mind, but Frank Ryan, Universal's writer and director, constantly heckles.

Three days before filing suit for divorce, Deanna denied split with Vaughn. Paul (Lieut., j.g.), assistant director of her first picture, was also her first beau. Gave her their new house in out-of-court agreement.

During "Christmas Holiday," with Gene Kelly, Gale Sondergaard took script too seriously, slapped D. so hard, close-ups that day were taboo.

DANCE DATE Petticoat frill for hemline interest. Arkay.

DINNER DATE Gardenia dress for above-table lure.

MOVIE DATE Doreen Dey's sheer print cinema suit.

■ Of course I know about you and your dates. You see, I thought you and I ought to be acquainted if I'm to give you pointers on clothes. So I asked Al Delacorte what you were like. Hmmm! You know how Al is when he gets going on one of his pet subjects. And it seems you're it. I came out hours later with a whirring in my ears. But now I know. You're the one who's got a certain lad looking so misty-eyed these days. The gal who has him counting minutes 'til his next leave or furlough. So-o-o . . .

With date nights so precious, every one's got to be good. First off, when he comes barging in singing about a "paper doll that he can call his own," don't believe a word of it. Actually, he'd find her pretty flat. He wants someone with a lot more substance. Your cue to look plenty inviting—BUT there's a limit!

Judy Garland has this down pat. The clothes she wears when she entertains at camps are "feminine but not female." The difference? There's a future in femininity. The other rates only a two-tone whistle. Perish forbid!

Key your duds to the date, and you'll put yourself over better. F'rinstance, if it's dinner, you'll want to keep most of the lure above the table. There are lots of new ways. With gardenias set in a row across your square neckline 'stead of just being parked on your shoulder (dress sketched). New draped sleeves, scooped-out U necks if this section of you warrants showing off. Otherwise, choose the kind that are filled in with frothy sheers. If your hat sports a veil, don't let it be too much of a one. They've been known to get entangled with the soup spoon.

But maybe you and he won't waste time over food if there's jive in the offing. In this case, switch the interest to your hemline. The dress I like is the print with the petticoat frill. To gain height, take your ruffles in the form of lengthwise cascades like the ones on the gardenia dress, or fishtail-fashion in back.

If it's movies, be sure to remember what a double feature can do to the seat of a dress. Your best bet is the two-piece cinema suit of printed, crush-resistant Bemberg sheer. Mouth-watering in color combinations like pink, gray and white. Very hush-hush about any bulges you might have. Be a lady in the dark and wear a close-fitting half-hat.

For an at-home date, don't lay the garb on too thick. Be dewey-fresh 'n' pretty. Wear a sheer printed cotton. Looks new and Shirley Temple-ish when frosted with eyelet embroidery. Learn to read tags when you shop for cottons. The "soap 'n' water" kind won't fade or shrink. Keep their sparkly finish, too.

In between times with him, you'll be helping at the canteen (in a purely platonic way, according to Jean Kinkead). Here, you'll want to look kind of crisp and impersonal. The plaid taffeta dirndl does it. Anybody can tell by that innocent round neck that you're not "come-hithering" the wolves. The button parade gives you shoulder width, makes your waistline look Grable-slim in contrast.

Sure, your head's in the clouds. But I know those Cinderella feet are on the ground solid, high heels 'n' all. Maybe you'd like a dress to stick by you for a long time to come. In this case, pin your hopes on the basic crepe with the dagger neckline and money bag drape. The side trick helps conceal any tummy bulge. What next? You slim down your mid-section, take off the money-bags, do a double-take on the sleeve bows and replace the cloisonette buttons with tailored ones. Suddenly you've a new casual shirt frock. This honey-for-your-money comes in "cosmetic" pastels as well as black and navy.

This is fun—but we can't sit around chattering all day. You've got a date coming up. If you want to know where to find these dresses and how very little they cost, or if you've got a special clothes problem bothering you, you know my address now: Marjorie Bailey, MODERN SCREEN, 149 Madison Ave., New York 16, N. Y. G'bye 'til next time.

Cadet Nurse Engaged

DOROTHY M. FORRESTER of the U.S. Cadet Nurse Corps to Charles C. Carmichael, an officer in the U.S. Army Air Corps.

ENLISTED IN A PROUD PROFESSION—Her nurse's "white" lends a special glamour to Dorothy's exquisitely smooth skin. "It would be wonderful," she says, "if high school graduates who see this would enlist as Cadet Nurses. We need more nurses so." As a Cadet Nurse you would be given free training, a monthly allowance. Write to U. S. Cadet Nurse Corps, Box 88, New York, N. Y.

FROM "HIM"! "Charles is as glad as I am that I'm one of the Cadet Nurse Corps," Dorothy says. Dorothy is wearing the official Cadet Nurse suit of gray wool. It has red epaulets and sleeve insignia. The beret matches the uniform and looks adorable with her soft-smooth Pond's complexion.

She's Lovely! She uses Pond's!

CADET DOROTHY FORRESTER is studying at the California School of Nursing in Los Angeles, not far from her home town in Vista.

Her smooth, capable hands are learning to bring comfort at a touch. Eyes smile gratefully after her trim young figure in its white on-duty uniform—especially becoming with her glorious, dark hair and the soft, fresh-as-a-new-day look of her lovely complexion.

"I'm a Pond's Cold Cream girl—always." Dorothy says, "I think there's nothing half as nice as Pond's for making your skin feel soft and clean."

Dorothy believes in a twice-over creaming with Pond's—this way:

1. She smooths Pond's fragrant soft-smooth Cold Cream over her face and throat. Pats it on briskly but gently to soften and release dirt and make-up. Tissues off thoroughly.

2. She rinses now with more snowy-soft Pond's, working its softening creaminess round her face with little spiral whirls of her finger tips—over forehead, cheeks, nose, mouth. Tissues off again well.

* * *

Give your face this soft-smooth Pond's complexion care that Dorothy loves. You'll see that it's no accident engaged girls like Dorothy, noted society beauties like Mrs. Ellen Tuck Astor, Mrs. Ernest du Pont, Jr., and Britain's Lady Morris use Pond's Cold Cream.

Ask for a luxurious big jar of Pond's today. Use it every night and every morning—and for in-between beauty clean-ups! You'll love Pond's, too!

ASK FOR A BIG LUXURY JAR! Save glass and man-power! And it's so quick to dip finger tips of both hands into the lovely wide jar!

What of Marriage? An increasing number of schools admit and retain married students. Many essential services, including the Army Nurse Corps, are open to married nurses. As a matter of fact, the marriage rate among nurses is unusually high.

The Free Education includes tuition and fees, board and room—and you get a monthly allowance of $15, $20, or $30, as training proceeds. Free, too, are the indoor and outdoor uniforms. The wearing of the outdoor uniform is optional; a Cadet Nurse dresses as she likes on her time off.

Ronnie Reagan, who's been doing terrific job recruiting women for service, spent last couple of days off scouring golf course for wife's diamond ring. Janie, formerly top amateur woman golfer in H'wood, just started brushing up on game.

The Laders (John and Hedy) planned shindig at Hollywood Canteen to mark day they'd met there, just one year before. John had portered that night while Hedy poured Java.

Good News

All stars turn out for MODERN SCREEN party! Milland on overseas camp tour. John Payne to go on bond tour of nation!

■ Undoubtedly the most photogenic event to take place during the month was the gala cocktail party given in honor of Mr. and Mrs. George Delacorte, Jr. Mr. Delacorte is Ye Editor's father (and looks like his slightly older brother) and the publisher of all Dell Publishing Company's magazines.

Mrs. Delacorte is a regal and beautiful woman who becomes instantly popular with the wives of celebrities, because she is genuinely interested in them and their families. Having six children of her own and one lusty grandson (whose picture appears on the editorial page of this issue of MODERN SCREEN), she is by way of being an authority on youngsters. During the party, Mrs. Delacorte had long chats with Ruth Hussey Longnecker, whose first child is due in May; with Mrs. Barry Sullivan, whose second baby is due in June, and with Mrs. Jim Brown, whose second is due late in the summer.

Lana and Steve Crane were there, talking about Cherry and about the fact that Steve had just signed a long-termer with Columbia Studios. This department is happy to predict that Steve Crane, at this time next year, will be considered one of the most exciting leading men in Hollywood.

John Harvey, under contract to 20th Century-Fox, was talking enthusiastically about his young daughter who had just come home from the hospital with her mother. John professed himself to be an expert on the problems incident to the well-being of a debutante of 14 days; when John was nine, he became the owner of a baby sister. His mother had been seriously ill, and a nurse had been unobtainable, so John attended to the triangular slacks situation, the sterilizing of bottles and the preparation of formulae. Thus initiated at an early age, he is now a tried-and-true veteran.

Alan and Sue Ladd came with Bill and Tess Bendix and convulsed the group by telling about their telephone troubles. It seems that Sue Ladd's daughter, Carol Lee, was asked—at school—to supply her home address and telephone number. Innocently, she complied. The following night the telephone sounded like an electric alarm clock gone crazy: It rang steadily from six o'clock until midnight. The following night, much the same record was established. In desperation, Alan went to the telephone company and begged them to change his number. The company is very busy these days. It looks upon number changing as frivolous nonsense. Finally, after a company representative had checked the Ladd line, it agreed solemnly that something had to be done. The Ladds have a new listing.

Paul Henreid spent some time in a far corner, talking very seriously about the war, with MODERN SCREEN's Ida Zeitlin, while Ida's artist husband—who is Russian—twinkled happily over Tamara Toumanova's description of her first picture soon to be released by RKO.

June Vincent came to the party with her great friend, Edgar Bergen, all unaware of the fact that less than a week later she would be in Jamaica, Long Island, where she flew to be at the bedside of her fiancé, Ensign William Sterling, who underwent emergency surgery.

Handsome men anywhere have become such premium personalities that it was orchids on the eyelids to stand in the same room to view Walter Pidgeon, John Hodiak with the white-lightning smile, Dane Clark (who is soon to answer those "Greetings"), Jess Barker, Alan Curtis, James Craig, Sonny Tufts (whose wife is as beautifully brunette as Sonny is blond), Neil Hamilton, Robert Paige, who is to be Deanna Durbin's next leading man, and Dana Andrews helping his wife to appetizers.

Roy Rogers was one of the first guests to arrive and supplied an authentic motion picture atmosphere by coming direct from the studio wearing make-up, Stetson, plaid shirt, jumper and levis. Someone asked an observer facetiously if Roy had brought his horse, Trigger. "No," was the deadpan answer, "Trigger is coming later with Lassie from Metro."

Deanna Durbin was wearing a hat that looked like a giant black tulip pulled rakishly over her sleek hair; Laraine Day wore clusters of shocking pink flowers amid her updo, and further glamour was furnished by cute Peggy Ryan (with her palsy-walsy Patty Boniface), Janet Blair, Dale Evans and Ella Raines.

MOMENTS WITH MINIATURES: Captain Ronald Reagan is having a little domestic trouble with a subordinate. When he was at home on a recent leave, his young daughter, snowball-blonde Maureen, was trying to get his attention at luncheon. Ronnie was busy talking with a friend and failed to turn around when Maureen tugged at his coat-tail. She tried with a more definite force, then said in a loud, clear treble, "Listen to me or I'm going to give you a poke in the nose." That she had learned in nursery school.

Her mother, in addition to Maureen's deportment problems, has troubles of her own. While she was playing golf recently, she removed her wedding ring, fastened it to her slackbelt and merrily covered the course. Later when she changed clothes, she noticed that the belt clasp had slipped its moorings and had dumped her watch and ring somewhere on the last green. The club employees went over the grass with rakes. They located the watch and several coins, but no ring.

Incidentally, Jane is now working in "Doughgirls" with Ann Sheridan and Alexis Smith. Director James Kern looked over his beautiful cast on the first day of shooting and announced that there was going to be enough mischief afoot to make him a candidate for a by-hourly benzedrine tablet. The girls decided forthwith to employ a maid for the three of them, not only to take care of the ordinary maid chores on the set, but to help them perpetrate the gags dearly beloved by all three.

They couldn't find a maid—not for love, money nor a screen test.

a snow storm. As all three of the Morgan children were born in California and have never seen snow except in newsreels and photographs, they were fascinated. He told them about bob sledding and skiing. He gave them directions for constructing a sizable snowman and designated icicles as frozen fringe.

Several days later Mrs. Morgan was readying her ingredients for a casserole dish and noted that a box of soda crackers had disappeared. Seeking to check this mysterious fact, she went to the back porch in search of Stan and Kris, who had been playing in the back yard. She found them hilariously pelting each other with handfuls of flaked crackers. "Look, Mommy," explained Stan, "it's snowing like crazy."

BIRTHDAY BUSINESS: Dizzying fame hasn't turned her lovely head. It simply didn't occur to Lana Turner that anyone except the members of her immediate family would remember her birthday. Yet, in her characteristic way, she wanted to celebrate. Her notion of a proper celebration was to order a gigantic cake to be brought on the set of "Marriage Is a Private Affair," and be served to the cast and crew with Lana's greetings!

It was the first time Lana's birthday has ever occurred when she was working on a picture, yet her personal crew (hairdresser, wardrobe mistress, make-up man, maid and secretary) knew the date. Their idea of a pleasant way to commemorate the event was to order a huge cake and have it delivered to the set.

James Craig, Lana's leading man in the picture, wanted in some way to wish the little lady well. He thought it over carefully and decided that a birthday cake, complete with candles and enough servings to stuff everyone, would be just the ticket.

Director Robert Z. Leonard, happy over the progress of his picture, decided that a few hours off—plus a colossal cake—would be a splendid way to felicitate his star.

So now everyone connected with the picture is calling everyone else "Marie Antoinette," the original perpetrator of that celebrated line, "Let them eat cake."

In addition to the pastry, Lana received a beautiful frame for the picture of herself and Cherry which has been stuck in the mirror of her dressing room. Second gift was a gag package containing chewing gum, cleaning tissues and soap flakes . . . and don't write in, asking this department where same were obtained. This department would regard such information as a prime military secret.

When Ann Sheridan left New York City, Steve Hannagan gave her a birthday package with the stern admonition that she wasn't to open it (1) until the proper date, and (2) at any rate until she reached Hollywood.

Annie managed to control herself until she reached Kansas City, but there feminine endurance melted. She snatched open the jeweler's velvet box to stagger her eyesight with the dazzle of a pair of emerald-cut ruby earrings, nestled beside three matching clips. Kinda pretty (gulp).

For two years the school teacher at Warner Brothers has cultivated Dolores Moran's history, mathematics, English grammar and general philosophy. She has worked with Dolores on the set and has spent luncheon hours with her in the commissary. As you know, studio teachers are benevolent watch dogs, charged with maintaining a select finishing school atmosphere despite the exotic aspects of studio life.

Yet even these serious-minded and responsible women relent with a sigh when a charge reaches the age of 18. Dolores' teacher gave her, in celebration of her newly adult status when she celebrated her 18th birthday, a tucked and beruffled black chiffon nightgown.

Dolores, in turn, gave Jerry Asher—local wit and Warner publicist—a glamour portrait of herself clad in a diaphanous black harem outfit, doubtless dreamed up by the wardrobe department after a dinner of lobster thermidor, warm beer and a basket of chocolate eclairs. Across the lower edge of the portrait Dolores wrote, "To Jerry from Whistler's 'new' mother."

On the day Bonita Granville became 21, her attorney arrived with a bulging briefcase and began to spread acres of legal documents before that startled citizen. In answer to Bonita's puzzled question, he explained that Bonita's mother had now ceased to be her guardian, and that Bonita was to take over the management of her own affairs. Then he settled down to a description of this trust fund and that; of income taxes under this bracket, and deductions allowed under that category. Next he launched into an analysis of her insurance program, and from that decimaled his way through the purchase of Bonds throughout their various series.

Bonita moistened her lips. "Isn't there some simpler way for me to handle this?" she asked weakly. The attorney said certainly, that Bonita could simply give her mother Power of Attorney, and she could continue to handle Bonita's business affairs.

So Bonita signed one small, delightful paper and recovered her pleasure in being grown-up.

Later that week, when she was packing preparatory to making a personal appearance tour through the Northwest, she noticed that her mother hadn't even dragged out her travel-worn cases. Upon inquiry, Mrs. Granville explained that a 21-year-old daughter was certainly able to travel alone. She was a woman now.

But from a small town only 200 miles away, Mrs. Granville received a wistful telegram after Bonita had been gone two days. "Tired of being twenty-one," it read. "Please meet me in Portland."

THAT LIQUID SUNSHINE: As you may have heard over your radio or read in your daily paper, Hollywood occasionally suffers from an attack of moisture. Natives are likely to toss this off with a glub and a pair of water wings; only saboteurs admit that they have had to comb fallen palm trees out of their attics, or have had to strain their victory gardens out of Los Angeles harbor.

Tenny rate, during the recent dampness, falling trees interfered with power lines in the valley to the extent that Ann Sheridan's electric eye motor gates were totally incapacitated. She couldn't get out, nor could guests, nor delivery trucks get in. She had no lights, no heat and no cooking facilities, so she boiled up a bit of soup over the fireplace.

Deanna Durbin's sister was in the same dilemma, but she had the added problem of a hungry four months' old baby, Lois Elaine, whose bottles had to be sterilized and whose formula had to be warmed, rain or no rain. So Mrs. Heckman, with Lois Elaine (the baby) and three-year-old Dickie, moved into Universal Studios where they occupied Deanna's permanent dressing room.

Hedy Lamarr reported to Warner Brothers, where she was working in "The Conspirators" in a drenched condition. Popping into the publicity department, she closed up her stolid black Chamberlain-type umbrella (someone asked her why she was carrying such an unglamourous article, and she answered, "Don't believe all the fancy things you read about me")—and proceeded to take off her dripping shoes and stockings. A messenger boy, seeing this ingratiating sight, spread the tidings and abruptly half the studio had urgent business in the office in which Hedy was twiddling her toes. Yes, they have Davis, Sheridan, de Havilland, Wyman, Alexis Smith, Dolores Moran and Joan Crawford around all the time. But this was Hedy—without shoes and stockings.

And down in Texas, which caught all the storm California couldn't absorb, Lieutenant Tyrone Power was roundly cursing the weather, too. It was making it very difficult for him to get his qualifying flying hours in.

NEWCOMERS YOU SHOULD KNOW: When you saw "What a Woman" starring Rosalind Russell, you probably began to feel spring in the air when Willard Parker leapt across the silver screen. To bolster this seasonal surge and to prove that Mr. Parker is not only intriguing but a regular guy as well, we offer this anecdote.

Willard Parker knocked around Hollywood for a long time, working in quickies and Westerns. He had one genuine friend, a chap named Max Arno, who was working at Warner Brothers. "Get out of this town," Mr. Arno counseled the blond viking, "and go to New York. If you can secure a good stage part, Hollywood (Continued on page 103)

Meet Belita!

A guy just doesn't kiss his girl in a theater lobby with a million people milling around . . . and the lights of the marquee shining in their eyes. Guys just don't act that way at all. And if they did, they'd get slapped. Even if the guy's 14 years old and his girl is 10. All the worse. When you're 10, you can blush harder than when you're 20. And getting kissed is no fun anyway. So Belita slapped him. But the incident left its scar.

If she'd been smart, she'd have forgotten about men right then, because the next thing that happened was really a fiasco. You know how you feel about your first real date. The long gloves and the tulle way down to your heels and the smidgin of perfume behind the ear . . . just to make things authentic. Well, it was like that . . . only worse because the date was for a ballet, not just a movie around the corner. Only thing was, Johnny (we'll call him that) was the kind of a fellow you'd ask for dinner at 7, and he'd pop in at 9:30 because things were always turning up. Unexpected things . . . and, "Gosh, I'm sorry I'm late but you see . . ." Always. You could count on it. Johnny'd given Belita her ticket and said to meet him at the Covent Garden Opera House. Knowing Johnny, it sounded risky.

Risky, nothing. It was brutal! Belita had done enough dancing and skating in London so that almost everybody knew her on sight. If she could just have stood quietly behind a door of the lobby and waited, it mightn't have been so bad. But here was everybody she knew stopping to ask did she get stood up, or didn't she think she was a little young to be getting around to places stag? As the curtain went up, she squeezed her way through the crowd thinking that if she slid deep down in her seat nobody would notice. But try being inconspicuous in the front seat of the very front box, when everybody in the (Continued on following page) whole darn theater is peering up to count the diamond tiaras. Or nudging each other—"That's Lady Twickington up there, you know. Of the Twickingtons-on-the-Bias."

You could either sit quietly staring at your shoes or get up and leave. It was easier to just sit. Through the first act . . . and intermission . . . and the second act . . . and another intermission . . . and finally, during the third act, in bounces Johnny. "Gosh, I'm sorry I'm late but—" You couldn't stand up right in the middle of the third act and tell him to go jump in the lake. But you could breeze out in a huff and never talk to him again as long as you lived. And never accept another date for months and months and months.

The trouble was, men were so different from Laurence Olivier. Remember "Romeo and Juliet"? He was absolutely as wonderful as Noel Coward, and handsomer. Though you didn't have to be handsome when you said things like Mr. Coward did. Once, when she'd danced for some people at a party, Mr. Coward had accompanied her, and when it was over, he'd said, "I thought I was to play for a little girl. If I realized I was to play for an artist, I'd have practiced." Just like that he said it . . . and she'll never forget it. Absolutely never.

People don't say things like that every day. Even when you've danced in Paris and London and Washington and skated

IN THE V-MAIL BAG

Hiyah Gang:

Thanks for your long, thin envelope postmarked Dec. 14, which arrived along with a bunch of belated Christmas cards that had apparently missed the boat.

The Overseas Edition of Modern Screen, you'll no doubt be delighted to hear, is the only movie mag which reaches us regularly via Special Service. The G.I. joes over here are all-out for your pin-up girls, since so many of them are practically all-out for us. You should see the mad scramble when a new Overseas Edition arrives. It soon looks like something you could play on a player piano, with wide open spaces where the pix were!

The films which Special Service gets for us have included "Hello, Frisco," "Coney Island," and more recently, "This Is the Army" and "So Proudly We Hail."

By the way, I think the producers should be told that scenes showing luscious banquets with steaks and such are unpopular with G.I.'s who have become hardened to the "C"-ration—pork sausage—canned meat routine. You asked how last Thanksgiving was—believe it or Ripley, but we had real turkey with all the fixin's!

Best wishes from some censored place in North Africa.

NO ROOM FOR TROUBLES IN THE NEW KIT BAG . . .

But plenty of room for magazines and note paper, cigarettes, sewing kits, razor blades . . . shall we go on? Or is it enough to say that all the small essentials servicemen keep writing home for are being packed in Red Cross kits and sent overseas. Trouble is, somebody's got to do the packing. Somebody's also got to make the thousands of surgical dressings . . . and the layettes for servicemen's babies . . . and sweaters and endless other items. Does a finger seem to point to you? Well, swell. Stop by at your local Red Cross and get the dope on their Production Corps. You know, if you're too tied up to come downtown, there's work you can do at home . . . with patterns, material and instruction furnished by the Red Cross. And if your club just happens to be casting around for a project, what nobler one than this? There've been lots of surgical dressing contests in high schools through the Junior Red Cross. And, boy, you should have seen that white gauze fly.

your way half around the world, really sincere compliments are rare. Like the time a fellow in Wichita wrote, "You're no Lamarr. Your smile's luke-warmish, and you could do more with your hair. Also, your figure's nothing to start a G.I. moaning low. But, holy cow, can you skate! How do you do it? Where'd you learn? And what do you have to have, to begin with?"

Well, for one thing, you've got to get the feel of things early. You've got to start ballet lessons practically before you can walk. And ice skating lessons shortly after. Then, what you try to do is not fall on your face more often than you have to. Of course, sometimes there's nothing you can do about it. When you're a year old, and you can hardly toddle a straight line let alone point your toe, you're bound to fall on your face. And when you're two and they dress you up like a crumby old doll or something and tie you to a branch of a Christmas tree, what can you expect? Bad habit, though. Sort of sticks with you.

Belita was opening an ice show in Washington when it happened again. The place was jammed to the seams. The spotlight flooded the crystal rink. Belita glided out swiftly, lightly, hardly touching the ice at all; cutting smoothly into the center of the rink; stopping sharply, so lithe and cool and poised that, watching her, you had to marvel. It was her night! You could tell it by the stillness of the place . . . and then by the terrific applause. Belita arched her body for another long, slow sweep. And then it happened! The scraping of skates in the ice . . . the thud . . . and suddenly, her fanny where her head should have been and her face where her feet should have been . . . and, Lord in heaven, where were her feet?

That's how you get to be a skater and probably an actress, too. And, holy cow, isn't it awful?

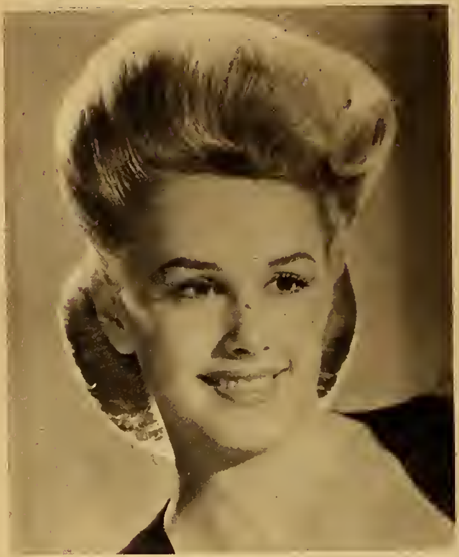
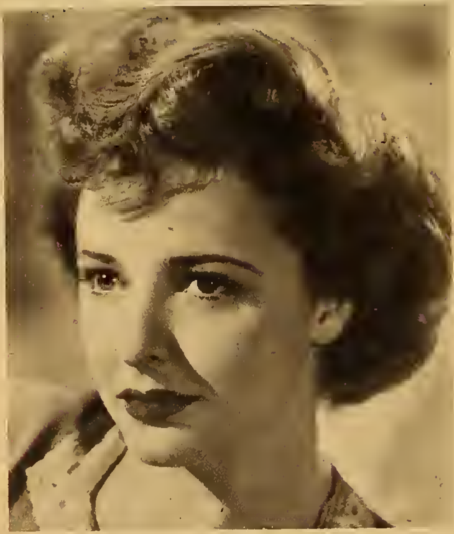
HE NOTICES YOUR HAIR

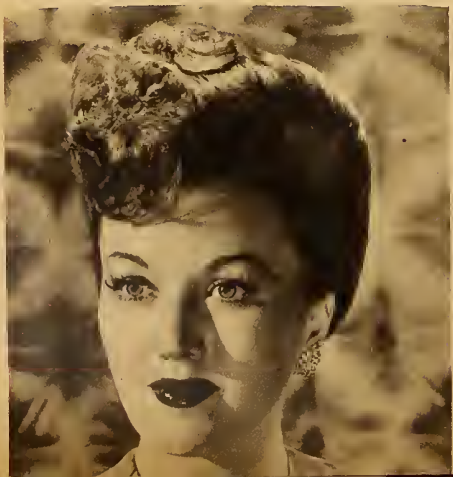
Blonde Bonnie Edwards favors a zooming pomp.



Laraine Day wears her hair short and curly.



Pert Ginny Simms wears her hair high and neat.



If you want the man in your life to be pleased with your coif, follow these Hollywood hints for coif styling!

■ That all-important he notices how your tresses look . . . so, ask you, how to design a fetching top-knot? Well, you've come to the right place, 'cause we know. We've been speaking to Nancy Walker, that female Rooney, about the curls and ringlets of Ginny Simms and Bonnie Edwards, her co-stars of "Broadway Rhythm" and, too, we've been chatting with Laraine Day (nice chatting). She has some bright ideas for your ringlets.

■ Here's the sum of all this talk about tresses. We'll assume for the moment that your hair is in condition, that you've been quite fussy about shampoos and that you brush said hair every day . . . you can learn ways and means of hair care by consulting "Curl-Cues from Vera" on p. 68. Still, the way you arrange your locks, leaves something to be desired. Instead of putting up with them as is, check on your hairdressing skill.

■ First, check on your equipment. The kind of comb frequently used in Hollywood studios (half teeth and half handle to grab on'ter) may suit you better than the usual straight comb. The weensy, cheap number you carry in your purse for hasty regrooming is not sufficient for full-time use. Get an efficient one. Then there are the small combs for holding coifs in place. Get good ones if you want them to stay put. There are those with teeth that poosh apart as you set the comb in, and then spring back together again. They're fine.

■ Try using plastic curlers. Try rolling wool over a curler and then rolling your hair over the two. A girl that Laraine Day knows whose hair is fine as silk and so unmanageable, does her curls up at the back in small strands, very flat and without dampening the hair at all. She secures each flat curl with two bobbie pins and then she sprays the whole thing with a little wave setting lotion which she keeps in an old perfume atomizer. That's a hint for the girl with hair like a baby's to whom the word "curl" is a red flag.

■ Don't overlook the male viewpoint, we repeat. Most men are taller than you, but how much thought do you give to the picture of the top of your head? Not enough, we'll bet! Hair parts are pretty when neat and sharply defined . . . but a menace if crooked and straggly. Be sure that yours travels in a straight line and that it's scrupulously clean (cotton wound on an orange stick and moistened with hair tonic will attend to that). To complete the pleasant scene for your he-man, see that the hair on your crown lies smooth and untangled.

■ Only last week one male, with an air of speaking for his entire sex, asked us, "Why don't you tell girls about the backs of their heads?" Far be it from us to disregard the masculine opinion on beauty, so we're passing this on to you. If you're not sure that every little strand is at its well-groomed best, why not make a spring resolution to use a hand mirror every day? And this habit will suggest brushing and using brilliantine, lacquer, pins and all those other gadgets which make your back locks live up to those that frame your pretty face.

Now that you're all convinced of the need of a new male and male-pleasing hair-do, which will it be? We'll admit right off that we can't tell you in detail (though our Super Coupon chart, "How to Have Beautiful Hair," can). But what Aunty Carter can do right now is give you general rules to follow for your particular type that we filched from Hollywood, city of magic lanterns . . . and smart hair-do's.

Choose your hair style, suggests Ginny Simms, in front of a full-view mirror. If you're tall and slender, don't make yourself into a bean pole with a pompadour set on top of your head. If you're small, don't cut your height by hair flat on top and fluffed out at the sides. Add several inches to your five-feet-or-so by piling your hair high and by holding your head like a swan.

If you have a practically oval face with even features, you can take liberties that less-flawless mortals have no right to consider. You can wear your hair up, down or sidewise and still look like an angel . . . though you're really smartest if you stick to smooth, clear, classical coifs that frame your Lamarr-like face and do not distract attention from it.

On the other hand (or should we say head?) if your face has irregularities—which, by the by, can be made just as endearing as the handsomest features ever molded—then you can have the fun of adapting your coif to tone down your bad (Continued on page 102)

CURL-CUES FROM VERA

By Carol Carter

Vera helps her pomp shine with brilliantine.

A hundred brush strokes a night is a must.

A beauteous blonde with brains! What charm, what loveliness! What an assignment! We stumbled from lunch at the Stork Club muttering pretty compliments all about Vera Hruba Ralston. At 22, Vera's life has been a series of adventures starting with an escape from Czechoslovakia and culminating in a starring role in Republic's "Lady and the Monster." Why that gal has already received three thousand proposals by mail. Gol-ly!

Vera skated plunk . . . right through the golden door of Hollywood. From the Ice-Capades to stardom in one easy, icy pirouette. A gal on blades, with bright spotlights shining on her, has to learn to outglisten the ice, La Ralston noted. "I learned to shine from my head to the tips of my figure skates. And the shining hair business I learned, I've remembered."

TO THE CLEANERS. "The essence of a beautiful topknot," Vera confided, "can almost be summed up in three words: spanking clean hair." You just can't do justice to any glamorous hair-do unless that hair is immaculate. Vera, like other movie folk, goes through the shampoo routine almost every night when she's emoting under hot camera lights. Her normal, not-working beauty routine includes a shampoo every eighth day. First she brushes her hair, but thoroughly, bending from the waist. This combination brushing and bending loosens dandruff, stimulates the scalp and keeps her waistline down to minute proportions. She dunks her head in warm water; pours over a bit of her favorite shampoo and vigorously rubs it up to a sudsy lather. (Continued on page 111)

Something's really going on when so many women write—of their own free will—on such a personal matter.

Recently, 10,086 women in virtually every kind of job (school girls and mothers, too) told why they're glad they switched to Modess. And when their letters were tabulated, just look . . .

TERRIFIC TRIO

glinting, promptly sat beside Granny and worked out a division of labor to create a wonderful duet.

Currently, Lon has two favorite songs, "Easy To Love" by Cole Porter, and a nostalgic song called "I'll Be Seeing You." He and his two buddies, Bill Eythe and Ray Sperry, devoted several weeks of intensive research to finding a recording of the song. At last they found a band record made by Henry King, a vocal on another disc by Tony Martin and Frances Langford, and a third recording made by the brilliant Hildegarde, something about "I'll Be Looking at The Moon but I'll Be Seeing You."

The Terrific Triumvirate memorized the words and melody, tried a little close harmony and found the result good. The instant they set foot in the McCallister house, they played the recordings and commented anew on the perfection of each.

In the midst of this jubilation over a swoony song, Lon received those celebrated "greetings." He was to be inducted, the little draft board said, late in February.

Granny, on hearing the news, went on stirring up a cake. For a long time she made no comment. Finally, as if it summed up all the clutching things having to do with her heart, she said, "I'll be looking at the moon, but I'll be seeing you." And then, after an interval of quiet, she added, "I'll never be able to look at the moon until Lon comes home when the war is over."

Lon's mother, whom he called—as a very small boy—"doll-mother," was even more terse and to the point. "When you leave," she announced with carefully controlled accents, "I think I'll break that record."

That first day was the bad one. After each of the women in Lon's life had allowed herself one emotional comment, they steadied down to a more humorous view of the situation. But the menus, oddly enough, began to consist entirely of Lon's favorite dishes. There was as much ground round steak as the McCallister points would permit—always with plenty of catsup poured over both steak and bun. Night after night the table boasted a big casserole of potatoes au gratin, and there was no sparing of cheese. Granny labored mightily in front of the oven, producing regiments of lemon pies—on one occasion Bill, Lon and Ray finished off three pies at a sitting. And when Granny wasn't making lemon pies, she was whipping up a three-storey chocolate cake veneered with yummy white icing. "You," accused Bill Eythe, poking his buddy's ribs, "are getting positively fat."

weighty problems . . .

"When they remake 'The Invisible Man', they won't exactly scream for you," observed Mr. McCallister.

To compensate for Granny's luscious cooking, The Terrific Triumvirate ambled down to Chinatown one night each week for a Chinese dinner. Whereas chicken chow mein, almond duck, fried shrimps and egg foo young are filling and delicious and crammed with vitality-producing elements, they have a very low caloric value.

One night shortly before Lon was inducted, Ray had a date, so Bill Eythe and Lon went out to dinner in duo instead of the usual triplicate. Offhandedly, Bill produced a small box. "Here's something to remember me by," he said. "Aw, nuts, don't look at me like that—this isn't anything much. It'll turn green in ten days unless you paint it with your mother's fingernail polish."

The box contained a friendship ring—a wide gold, very masculine band. "I'll wish it on," Bill said gruffly as he pushed it into place on Lon's finger. "Don't take it off until you get to your basic training camp. And—er—when you take it off, well then you can read the inscription on the inside."

Lon looked hard at the handsome ring. Then he shook hands with Bill. "Gosh, the things you do find in dime stores," he kidded, but there was no kidding and no superficiality in the long, steady look he exchanged with the man who has been his fellow-dramatic struggler and fellow prankster for many precious years.

Between them it wasn't necessary to talk about the things in both minds: Bill would like to be going off to camp with Lon; he would like to make Lon's try for the Air Corps, but he has two punctured eardrums, so has been classified 4F. On the other hand—and there is no derogatory shading in the comment because it is the habit of American men to give up reluctantly their hard-won toeholds in any business when faced with war, but to give every ounce of determination and devotion to the task at hand when fighting is necessary—Lon has just begun to catch on in pictures. He and Bill had talked about working in a picture together at some time. To give up such dreams and the first small aura of success is not easy, either.

curator of goose flesh . . .

Incidentally, Lon returned from location in Kentucky only a week before he was inducted. He had been East with a company making "Home in Indiana." (Don't be perplexed by a motion picture about Indiana being shot in Kentucky—it's the picture business.) While there, the cast rolled out into the frigid dawn without benefit of hot shower or steaming coffee. And, because the scenes being shot during many of the sequences were presumed to have occurred during summer months, the boys were working in slacks and sneakers, their upper torsos bravely bare. To commemorate this rugged situation, Lon and Hal Roach, Jr., formed "The Brave New World Athletic Club." Lon was made Curator of Goose Flesh, and Hal was Vice President in Charge of Frost Bite. Had there been sufficient snow at Lake Arrowhead or Big Bear, nearby mountain settlements, Lon intended to initiate Ray Sperry and Bill in this quaking organization before he left, but the weather was uncooperative—too warm for shivering ceremonial rites.

Lake Arrowhead has been the scene of a great many McCallister-Sperry-Eythe conclaves. The lake is large and deep enough to allow a great display of seamanship, and the trio are thataway about boats of all kinds. Last summer, Ray Sperry and Lon were maneuvering a dinghy against a stiff breeze; a dinghy, as any sailor will assure you, is a craft as unreliable of balance as a tipsy tightrope walker. Suddenly it tossed its sail like a mettlesome horse, and rolled over; Lon, who is a competent swimmer, fell to one side and Ray, who can't swim at all, dived into the blue on the other. He bobbed to the surface and clung to the bottom of the boat.

There was only one other boat on the lake that day, so Lon yelled at Ray to hang on, and he struck out like mad for the other craft. He is still a little exasperated at this burst of heroics, because he decided on sober second thought—three days later—that it would have been more efficient to have crawled up beside Ray and joined voices in an attracting war whoop.

Although Lon has won no medals for lifesaving, he does cherish three trophies won in school. One season he was the anchor man on their relay race which placed first in the interscholastic track meet. Each member of the team received a ribbon. He also won his basketball letter, and once won third ribbon for exhibition riding. Know how you win ribbons for such equestrianship? Well, you have to know your Dobbin so well that you can induce from him the three conventional gaits (walk, trot and canter) at hand signals. If he happens to be what is described as a High School horse, the rider must also be able to secure a pace and a rack (which is also called a single-foot) on signal. In case Lon had not been interested in the Air Corps, he would have made an excellent cavalry officer.

Aside from his family, his two pals and water jeeps, Lon's chief enthusiasm is his Great Dane dog, McDanois. Mac is a fragile creature of 153 pounds with a bark like the detonation of a 90 millimeter gun, and the soft soul of a Siamese kitten. He is now nearly four years old. His predecessor in Lon's affection was Pat, a Boston Bull whom Lon owned and operated as a pet for 15 years. Lon can't remember a time when Pat wasn't part of his life.

He was on the set of "Home in Indiana" when his mother telephoned Lon to say that Pat had died. "Thanks for calling me," Lon managed to say. He thought he was going to be able to control himself, but the realization of his loss was too much. Before the rest of the cast and the crew, Lon broke down and cried.

The director patted his shoulder and said he knew how it was, but would Lon mind standing in the scene just long enough to get the lights adjusted? Lon shook his head and took his place. There he stood facing the lights and camera and trying to get hold of himself. He didn't know until several days later that the canny director had taken advantage of the moment by shooting the one scene in the picture which required a great show of emotion on Lon's part. When you see the picture, watch for that sequence and remember that it was genuine sorrow that prompted the tears, not over the picture situation, but over the lost life of a lovable Boston Bull.

On Lon's upper lip are two fine lines no more than pencil mark scars. Both mementos were secured in the same way, although several years apart. When Lon was still a pantywaist he was holding Pat on his lap one day, blowing softly in her face. Abruptly, Pat leaped forward and fastened on Lon's upper lip, inflicting a cut as neatly delicate as a surgeon could have done. Mrs. McCallister phoned for a doctor, crying and insisting that Lon would have a hair lip. The doctor, a competent needleman, inserted a few stitches and said the laceration would leave only a hair line. He was right.

double rip . . .

Time passed and the scion of the McCallisters acquired Mac, the Great Dane. Mac was a humorous puppy who rolled and laughed when teased. One day Lon was holding the playful Mac in his arms and blowing softly upon his nose. Return to the paragraph above and reread.

"Gosh, I should think you would have learned," observed Ray Sperry upon learning these details.

With great dignity Lon responded, "I never make the same mistake three times, bub."

As one might expect, Lon's favorite comic strip is "Napoleon and Uncle Elby." Next comes "Barnaby" which is published locally in the "Hollywood Citizen-News"; the McCallisters subscribe to this paper principally because Lon considers that day lost on which he hasn't carefully checked the doings of Barnaby, a precocious kindergarten undergraduate who has a fabulous fairy godfather wearing a derby, topcoat and wings that any aeronautical expert will insist are too short to levitate his fuselage. However, the fairy godfather does fly. And disappear. And materialize certain animals such as a talking dog. It's all very quaint and wonderful and very, very McCallister.

After having read "Napoleon" and "Barnaby," Lon turns to "Blondie" (he thinks Dagwood one of civilization's great contributors because of the well-known sandwich), then reads "Terry and The Pirates." Then he turns to the front page and studies the world headlines. After that the sports pages and the ads.

Although Lon, in anticipation of a khaki wardrobe, has bought no new clothes for eight months, he would be a handy man with a hundred hangers if the situation warranted. He goes for shaggy tweeds, plaid shirts and argyle sox. Any tie with a design smaller than a goose egg would be considered primly Bostonian in the McCallister press. His favorite basic color for accessories is dubonnet.

Lon's mother busied herself for months, knitting a colorful sox assortment for her Technicolor-footed son; then she had to give up the painter's pallet yarn and convert to khaki. "There's one thing about it, Doll-mother," Lon grinned, returning for the occasion to his junior title for her, "when I make one of those celebrated 25-mile marches without blisters, your sox are going to become famous."

In times past, the Terrific Triumvirate have frequently dated one girl simultaneously. It has been Marjorie Riordan, who had a part in "Song of Bernadette," or Nancy Walker, who is under contract to M-G-M, or Jean Crane, under contract to 20th Century-Fox. The dates have consisted of beach parties or dancing at Lon's or a movie terminated at a drive-in by a Pepsi and a sandwich.

glowing dream girl . . .

Of the current crop of Hollywood dream men (Alan Ladd, Ronald Reagan, Sonny Tufts, Barry Sullivan, Donald O'Connor, James Craig, Jean Pierre Aumont, Glenn Ford, Tyrone Power and Clark Gable), only Captain Gable and Lon McCallister are singletons.

Lon has never been in love, but he has his dream-girl ideal, to wit: She should be petite, between 4' 10" and 5' 2". He doesn't care whether she's blonde, brunette or redhead, as it isn't coloring but personality that seems important to Lon. She should be sincere and natural. She should be a brain but not show-offish about it. She shouldn't be infallible; she shouldn't know it all. Her mistakes and her occasional reliance upon Lon's judgment would only endear her to him. But most of all she should have a certain inner glow, something shining and colorful—as if she had swallowed an Arizona sunset.

If you wonder what kind of a soldier Lon will make, hang on because comes now a chronicle of his first G.I. experience. The day he was sworn in and told to report one week later, he was sent up to the fourth floor of the building and ordered to scrub the floor. He set to work, giving the planks a water massage to restore that forest complexion.

One of the WAC's, around whose feet the scrubbing was being done, recognized Lon. "Weren't you in 'Stage Door Canteen'?" she wanted to know.

Lon said yes.

"What are you going to do in the Army?" she pursued.

"As soon as I'm an initiated G.I.," Lon said firmly, "I'm going to visit the nearest Canteen, either Hollywood or Stage Door, and find out how it really feels to be on the inside looking out, instead of being an outsider trying to get a look in."

On this and other activities of Pvt. McCallister, you may expect exciting reports.

THE MAN IN DEANNA'S LIFE

plugging in her own inimitable way.

Deanna and Dickie share one additional secret: Dickie may be, according to years, a mere youngster, but in mind he is a little old man. He is a little old man because he has a bushy white mustache! This fantastic fact is the result of Deanna's puckish sense of humor. After Dickie has drunk a glass of milk, Deanna always lifts him up to a mirror where he can see the milk-foam line on his upper lip.

The first time he saw a picture of Santa Claus, he shook his head as Deanna does when she disapproves of some action of his. "You've been careless with your milk," he told Santa Claus.

Dickie takes up a great deal of Deanna's leisure time, of course, and his kid sister (born October 20) is another hour-user-upper. Deanna's third hobby is the Hollywood Canteen.

No matter how weary she is, she always manages to appear every Tuesday night. One evening she arrived in an exhausted condition and made her way to the table at which she is hostess. There was a lone sailor seated there. Everyone else was dancing or assaulting the snack bar or kibitzing the orchestra. Deanna looked at him and smiled. Then she tried to think of something constructive to say. She asked where his home was, and whether he had ever been in Hollywood before.

Apparently the seaman sensed her effort because he grinned at her suddenly and said, "You don't have to talk to me, Miss Durbin. I'm happy just to be sitting here looking at you."

So, in comradely silence, they sat together, watching other couples dance and afterward listening to the hour-long show put on by other motion picture celebrities. The next day, in telling friends about it, Deanna said, "Isn't that a reversal for you? I was supposed to be entertaining him, yet the way it worked out, he was really helping me to relax. It was just as cosy and comfortable as sitting in front of the fireplace with someone you know so well that you don't have to say a thing."

mail call . . .

On another occasion she spent a hectic evening giving autographs. Every time she looked up, there were five more notebooks or hats or belts or letter-backs to be signed. She worked and she worked until midnight, then—a fugitive from writer's cramp—she hurried home and went to sleep.

The following morning she was on the set when a telephone call came in from her cousin, a seaman in the Navy. "If you aren't surrounded by G.I.'s" he said, "I certainly would like to see you. I visited the canteen last night, but it was too much for me—I couldn't get through the mob surrounding you. I decided to announce myself when you would have time to look me in the eye instead of the fountain pen."

A good deal of Deanna's mail is now from earnest G.I.'s. She recently received notice from a parachute battalion in Italy that she had been voted the girl with whom they would most like to make a double jump.

In a later mail delivery she had a letter from a chap in a post in the South Pacific. He explained that he and a group of his buddies had been yarning one night about the activities of stars who made Army camp tours. From that topic, the conversation moved on to the general subject of the attitude of famous persons toward the general public or the private soldier. "Most of those dames wouldn't even give a guy a nickel bag of peanuts," summed up one disillusioned pfc.

A second soldier begged to differ. He said he would wager a fancy sum in the coin of the realm that Deanna Durbin WOULD send him a nickel bag of peanuts. He had a flock of takers in less time than it takes a pair of ivory conga cubes to wipe out a pay day.

So he wrote to Deanna, using pencil and paper and a slight flavoring of fox-hole mud. She promptly sent him a five cent bag of peanuts so that the terms of his bet would be fulfilled. Then she had a king-size carton of peanuts forwarded for the benefit of the soldier and the entire enrollment of his platoon.

The long arm of coincidence reached out to bless one of Deanna's canteen friendships recently. Some months ago she had spent an evening dancing with and talking to a personable Marine. He had been interested before induction in little theater groups, and so was able to discuss plays and pictures with wit and understanding. He knew at the time that he was on his way overseas, so—in the months that followed—Deanna thought of him occasionally and wafted a wish heavenward for his well being.

I SAW IT HAPPEN

A few weeks ago my buddy and I were strolling gloomily down Hollywood Blvd. . . . feeling pretty lonesome. Everybody but us seemed to be having such a good time. At a red traffic signal a big car pulled up along side of us with Eddie Cantor at the wheel.

Without thinking I waved and said, "Hi, Eddie." He grinned and motioned to us, "Come on, boys, get in." We were driven to a drive-in where the three of us had a coke and a long chat. Eddie was so congenial and interested in us, we forgot we were friendless in a busy town. When he left us, my buddy turned to me and said, "Boy, there goes a white guy!"

fortunes of war . .. .

Recently she received a friendly note from him saying that he had been honorably discharged after his overseas experiences and that he had been signed to a long term contract by RKO. His name is Chris Drake, and Deanna—pondering the intricacy of human affairs—has observed that it would be a neat summing up of things if she and Chris could one day work in a picture together.

In other ways Deanna's life and her work are touched by the war. Recently she received a letter from a girl who had been engaged to be married to an Air Corps pilot. They had set their wedding day, but he received orders which moved him abruptly out of the country before the nuptial arrangements could be completed. His subsequent letters indicated that he was in England and that he was participating in the heavy raids over Germany.

On the very day upon which the girl had planned to be a bride, she received the heartbreaking telegram from the War Department telling her that her fiancé had been killed in action. The shock was so great that the girl went into a mental state describable only as emotional coma. She couldn't cry, she couldn't think, she seemed to be completely cut off from life.

She had to give up her job. She felt that she had lost all contact with the world forever.

One night she and a friend went to see "Hers To Hold." During the scene in which one of Deanna's fellow workers in an aircraft plant learns of her husband's death overseas, the girl suddenly burst into frenzied tears. She wept so tragically that she had to leave the movie, of course, but afterward she seemed to be able to reason with herself. She went back to work, crushed and wretched of course, but still able somehow to carry on. She had written to thank Deanna for having made the picture.

Deanna's next picture, by the way, is "Christmas Holiday," a film version of the distinguished book by Somerset Maugham. It was a Maugham vehicle, "Of Human Bondage," that launched Bette Davis as a dramatic actress, and the same may be true of Deanna.

Heretofore, Deanna's screen parts have held a close likeness to her own personality development. She has been sweet, wholesome, blossoming. In "Christmas Holiday" she has her first opportunity to portray a difficult role, totally foreign to her own character. The casting of the picture was an aspirin special at the studio. A good deal of thought was given to the change in Deanna's screen career. Would she be able to get her teeth into the part and extract the juice from it? Would the far-flung and highly voluble Durbin fans approve?

Deanna, who is as bright as Babson beneath that sugar-coated exterior, gave the entire problem a good deal of personal skull scrimmage. She read the book carefully, re-reading those passages dealing with the character and behavior of the girl she was to portray. Then, when the shooting script came through, she decided that she was a big girl now, and there was no reason for her to forego the dramatic challenge of "Christmas Holiday."

When she is working, Deanna sets the alarm for 5:45 A.M. She awakens instantly to that clarion voice, shuts it off, closes the window and turns on the heat. Then she snuggles back into the dream sack for another 15 minutes. That means that she has to be a small tornado of speed when she does arise formally and officially, because breakfast is ready at 6:30—too early an hour for anyone to be able to look a bowl of cereal in the face without cringing. She forces herself to eat something because noon is a long way down a corridor of busy hours, and her appetite, unless appeased in the morning, begins to kick up about 10:30.

From breakfast, she makes a beeline for the studio. While she is working in a picture, she has her hair shampooed twice a week, but it has to be set every morning. When she isn't working, a shampoo and wave once a week are sufficient.

She reports to the set in costume and make-up at 9. After luncheon each day she takes a 30-minute vocal lesson. Between takes, while the lights or camera are being adjusted, Deanna knits in her dressing room. She is now champion purler of the bobby sox brigade, having made several non-dropped-stitch pairs for herself.

extra curricular activities . . .

She tried, some time ago, to read between takes, but she found that she became so interested in the dialogue and the situations in the book that when she returned to her own cinematic troubles they didn't seem half so vivid or interesting as the fictional fiascos she had just put aside.

Deanna occasionally brings recordings to the studio and plays them. This happens only between the time she completes production on her left sock and casts on stitches for the right.

At six, when shooting for the day is usually finished, Deanna sometimes rushes over to her sister's home for dinner without stopping to remove the make-up. Dickie has been known to be found—after a vociferous kiss—wearing almost as much grease paint as Aunty May Pole.

On other evenings, Deanna meets Anne Shirley—who lives just across the street from Deanna—and they have dinner together. If the points are plentiful they eat at home; if the paper shortage has caught them with no reds, they eat out.

Highlights in the Durbin experience at present are such social functions as the birthday party that was given for her on the set. Every year the studio presents her with a birthday cake, the proportions of which have expanded as Deanna herself has grown up. This year, because Deanna is now a senior citizen of 22, the local bakers did themselves proud. The skyscraper cake that was wheeled onto the stage—where all work instantly ceased—looked like Hansel and Gretel's dream of a merry-go-round.

"Line up, everybody," Deanna called, arming herself with a long-bladed knife. She carved and she carved. At first the wedges she cut were three or four inches wide. After she had served several dozen members of the crew, Deanna glanced down in consternation along the queue still waiting for a slice of cake. The portions became smaller. And smaller.

Her last guest had to eat his share in a hurry or it would have been wafted away, as light as a feather on the breeze. Deanna didn't get so much as a crumb of the cake. She made up for the lack that night, however, when her sister served a chocolate cake sporting 22 candles.

fragile cargo . . .

The publicity department, which claims Deanna as its baby and woe to anyone who harms a hair of her dearly loved head, chipped in and bought her a treasure in the form of a Dresden figurine. Dan Thomas, head of the department, purchased it on behalf of his co-workers while he was in New York. He brought it back swathed in cotton, protected by paper shredding, and transported in a perfectly huge carton.

The figurine is approximately ten inches long and six inches high, a ceramic masterpiece in the form of a sofa on which are seated three exquisite ladies of fashion.

Deanna hasn't decided (1) exactly which nook in her house is to be graced by this beauty or (2) how to get it home without accident. She thinks now that she will persuade some very steady and reliable member of the department to nestle it fondly in his arms while she drives her car home.

And most assuredly she will wear her lucky jacket while on this short journey. The lucky jacket is a blue herringbone affair that Deanna wears over white blouse and blue slacks when she has to remove her picture wardrobe while she has luncheon in the commissary.

The jacket is currently distinguished by a wide daub of green paint that she annexed while her dressing room was being redecorated. Around the collar there is a slight but unmistakable stain of grease paint. But Deanna loves it with a great and unchanging devotion.

The lucky jacket is probably just a good-natured gesture of homage to the gods because anyone as genuinely sweet and talented as Deanna Durbin is going to spend years and years winning the worthwhile end of the wishbone he's made his family happy. He's tasted the glories of golf championships; he's tingled to the kick of seeing his own racing colors come pounding down the stretch. He's dabbled in the big business of sports promotion. He's made his millions, collected more honors than a dog has fleas. He's still the juke box king, radio rajah, box-office champ. But outside of possibly having his own kids, he has never had thrills like he's collecting these days—bringing tuneful joy to the hearts of Uncle Sam's soldiers and sailors.

BING ON THE BEAM

For instance, there are some colored doughboys in Arizona who don't rate Bing Crosby's efforts particularly pint-sized—and they don't know half the story, either, of how Bing came to brighten their weary barracks load, and what a scuffing around that night cost him after he left their camp.

Bing and his constant camp tour companions, song-writers Johnny Burke and Jimmy van Heusen, were waiting for a train in Phoenix, Arizona, after a big air training base show. As a passenger, Bing can take airplanes or leave them, and the gas shortage has made auto travel tough out West, so he used the cinder circuit while doing something for the boys.

Anyway, there were a couple of hours to fiddle around that afternoon in Phoenix, and Bing heard about this camp for colored soldiers, only a few miles away. So far, nobody from Hollywood or anywhere else had ever showed up to give them a show. "What're we sticking here for then?" asked Bing. He figured they could whiz over, sing a few numbers and get back in time for the West-bound rattler.

But when Bing showed up in the camp, he found it gathered round to a man in a little hollow waiting him, with big white smiles that just ate your heart right out like a watermelon. So, instead of crooning an hour he sang four hours until he couldn't squeeze another note out of his limp larynx and until the purple dusk was inky black, and all you could see on the hills were those white smiles.

But when Bing got back to Phoenix—no train! Some miracle had made it actually on time and so Bing and Johnny and Jimmy grabbed a taxi and chased it to the next stop—in time to sniff the departing dust. They careened in their car to the next, and finally at a third town, the flying cinders mocked them for keeps. It was midnight then and no more trains West. Bing and the boys trooped into a dinky, wooden station and parked on the rugged benches while the telegraph keys ticked away.

sittin' on a log . . .

And to top it all off, Bing cut a gash in his leg and a rip in his favorite pastel slacks (he got it tumbling from autos to chase trains). But he even got a kick out of the wound, the ripped trousers and the restless night. In fact, he tags it the highlight so far in his entertainment career.

There's not really anything to stop the presses in all of this—except that for years and years around Hollywood Mister Bing Crosby has been notoriously tagged as the laziest man in town.

But the Great Transformation took place not long after Pearl Harbor. First came the Hollywood Victory Caravan, and then when Bing was returning to Hollywood from a trip to Mexico, he docked at New Orleans, traveled through Louisiana and Texas on the way home and impulsively stopped off at the brand new Army stations dotting those states. Unannounced, Bing just dropped in on the boys and, of course,

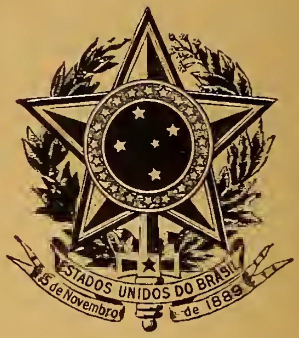
The twelfth in our series on THE FOODS OF OUR ALLIES

"I taste eet, then I season eet!" says Carmen Miranda, famous samba specialist of screen and stage. She loves good food and favors dishes prepared at home in the Brazilian manner.

"Where did you get that hat?" It's an old native costume in Bahia, laughs Carmen, who introduced her version in Rio, then added more ornaments for a towering Hollywood success.



BRAZIL

The coat of arms of the Brazilian Republic, illustrated above, is outstandingly appropriate. Each ray of the five-pointed star is half-green, half-yellow—these being the national colors, chosen to symbolize the country's forests and its gold—with a spray of coffee on the left and one of tobacco on the right, representing two of its most important crops. Within the star is a double circle in blue; the outer circle containing twenty stars, one for each of the twenty States, the inner circle featuring the five stars of the Southern Cross. Across the handle of the vertical sword appear the words: "The United States of Brazil," while under this is the date of the establishment of this vast, rich republic.

■ Singing sensation of many a musical movie and currently starring with Don Ameche in the 20th Century-Fox Technicolor film, "Greenwich Village," Carmen Miranda has been variously described in such colorful terms as vivid, exotic, torrid and even barbaric! But the description we favor, at this particular time, is "The Brazilian Bombshell." For it is as the vivacious representative of this imagination-stirring country that she appears here—to help us wind up our series on "The Foods of our Allies" in "The Sous American Way!"

Fortunately for us, and for this story, Miranda "luffs to eet!" Stated—in that rapid-fire way she has of talking—that "What's cookin'?" was one of the first American slang phrases she ever used, "maybe because I always hoped the answer it would really interest me!" Spoke of native Brazilian dishes with enthusiasm; mentioned by name the ones she likes best and—with the help of sister Aurora—gave us directions for making some of these Miranda favorites. Told us that in Brazil, as in so many South and Central American countries, rice is the outstanding food staple—always on the table at both lunch and dinner, "to eet it or not, as you choose." Mentioned beans, prepared in many an interesting fashion, as also rating high in popular esteem. So necessary, it seems, are rice and beans to all Brazilians that a native is said to "earn his feijoa e arroz,"—meaning beans and rice—instead of his "bread and butter!"

Our star also spoke of avocados, and explained they never appear in the form of a salad, but turn up instead in main course and dessert dishes. And, as was to be expected, since Brazil is the leading coffee producing country of the world, Carmen went on at length about this beverage which Brazilians—starting from childhood!—drink with a degree of enthusiasm perhaps unequalled anywhere else in the world. In fact, we learned, it is common for a Brazilian to consume from one to two dozen cups of coffee a day; in the morning as cafe con leite (coffee with milk) but, during the rest of the day, with sugar but without cream.

Coffee, to them, is not only the symbol of hospitality, but the necessary, the perfect accompaniment to all social and business discourse, whether it's a diplomatic or commercial call, a visit to a friend's house, or a stopover at one of the sidewalk cafés they love to frequent—where coffee is sipped at small, marble-topped tables in true continental style. No wonder, therefore, that although there are no special Brazilian decorations in Carmen Miranda's Beverly Hills home, to "set the scene" for her, there is always a filled coffee pot on the back of the stove; so that the family, and members of her Banda Da Lua (Band of the Moon) who wander in at odd hours, may always feel free to help themselves to any number of small cups of their favorite beverage.

And what of the Brazilian-style dishes we are featuring in this month's attractive little leaflet? Well, you'll find that they're the type that are "in season" the year around and will be welcome at your own dinner table. And our recipes for these food favorites of this South American good neighbor have been carefully tested and double-checked for accuracy.

For, not content with accepting one person's opinion on the subject of Brazilian foods—even though that person is a native of the country as well as a screen star—we went direct to the charming wife of Eurico Penteado, Financial Counselor of the Brazilian Embassy and representatives of Brazil on the Pan-American Coffee Bureau, UNRA, and other committees of international importance.

Senhora Filoca Penteado is a hostess famous in diplomatic circles, and among her friends, for the Brazilian specialties she herself knows how to prepare. We therefore consider ourselves fortunate indeed in having been able to go over with her the Miranda recipes we are offering you this month.

You'll find in the leaflet a recipe for Picadinho—Carmen's tasty version of hash, highlighted with further suggestions from Senhora Penteado. And Feijoada, a combination of feijao preto (black beans) and meat—several kinds of meat, it seems, and all of it either of the low-point or no-point variety. There's Camaroesa Bahiana—a colorful blend of pink shrimp and green okra—to be served with the inevitable rice, with directions for cooking the rice included. There's an avocado suggestion which we think perfect as a party main-dish. And finally there's Miranda's favorite, Creme de Abacate—avocado dessert "that ees out of thees world."

he sang. By the time he got back to Hollywood, he could hardly put his attention to his radio show and the Paramount picture coming up.

army clambakes . . .

Soon as he hit town, too, something else happened. An Army lieutenant showed up in Hollywood one day. He came from the Muroc Dry Lake air base up north of town, and he was A. W. O. L. He'd practically hitched his way south with a purpose. He showed up at the Hollywood U.S.O. with a story that hit Crosby and Company right over the ticker.

Up there at the air base there was nothing for his pilots and ground crew to see or do. No towns near, no nothing, except a vast expanse of alkali dust and dismal stretches of bare sun-baked hills. There weren't even any barracks, just tents and revetments and a wind that never let up. But at that same place, Air Corps patrol bombers were taking off every few minutes and winging their way out over the Pacific Ocean. Those boys were pitching for defense when the pitching was plenty tough, when Jap subs were off the coast blowing up ships and shelling the shore.

Well, when Bing and his brother Larry heard about that, they got going pronto. They got together a gang of stars, took it up to Muroc the next day, and turned a revetment into the Roxy to chase the motor drones out of those hero guys' ears. That cinched it. From that day on Bing and the Crosby clan have been on an all-out soldier entertainment basis. Larry does most of the management work, getting up professional vaudeville and movie talent, expertly rehearsed shows—no pickup stuff. "These guys are hep," warned Bing at the start, "nothing but the best." And that's the way it has been. Bing can't always make the shows himself, because there are still pictures to make, his radio program, a dozen benefits and small-time war chores here and there about Hollywood. But they go out regularly like Phil Silvers, Rags Ragland, Faye Mackenzie, John Scott Trotter's band, all Bing's Paramount and radio star pals. Bing has diverted all the proceeds from his biggest selling record, "Silent Night," to help pay expenses for this good work. But he still has to dig down in his own pocket now and then when the going gets rough.

Bing's Crosbyettes—his sons—have had a little trouble in their war efforts. The spirit is mighty willing—but in the case of Gary, the flesh sags sometimes. Bing started cutting in the youngsters on his Army clambakes one Sunday when he was sitting around the house with nothing to do and got to feeling guilty about it. So he hopped in the car with Gary and Linny and ran over to the Hollywood Turf Club, where his own sugar-footed nags used to circle the track. Today it's another Army post, and that Sunday Bing turned it into a circus. The kids came through with impersonations and a skit they'd worked up on "The Seven Dwarfs." After that Bing told them they were on the team, and the next time he made a camp trip, he packed them along.

When Bing finished his songs before the big audience, he said, "I'm running out of voice, but here's a little gravel-throat who wants to take a crack at this crowd." Gary was ushered up to the mike, but got stage fright and couldn't make his legs move. The soldiers roared, but Bing wasn't caught short. He summoned Linny, hardly more than a tot. "Never mind," said Bing, "we got a mob of show-offs at our house." Linny never batted an eye but came through right away with his version of "Pop Eye the Sailor Man," whistle effects and all. He brought down the house, too.

Well, that episode almost caused a family schism at the Crosbys. Because when Bing got home, he cluck-clucked severely and sighed, "Well, I guess Gary can't make the team on any more camp shows. He won't work. Have to leave all excess baggage at home these war days, you know. Linny did a great job. He's in solid."

Of course, such ignominy was not to be borne by anyone, let alone a Crosby with some Irish in him. Pretty soon Gary was begging his dad to please give him another chance. "I'll sing this time," he promised. "I'll work up a real routine." Which he did—spent a week on it, in fact. The act was take-offs on Papa Bing's singing tricks, and Gary covered everything from "I Surrender Dear" on up to date. But when the fatal camp appearance arrived, Gary gazed into the soldier mob and—again his knees wilted. Just the same Gary gritted through it, but he got all mixed up and boobed his cues. So he turned to Jimmy van Heusen at the piano and letting himself off the hook, barked crossly, "What's the matter? Can't you get it right?"

the inner man . . .

Bing rehearses a camp show twice as long as he does his radio program. He always insists that a Paramount gag writer friend of his, Barney Dean, go along with his outfit to nose around among the soldiers beforehand and find out what G. I. dropped the tray of dishes on K.P. or who is having love trouble with a local blonde babe or something. Then he whips up some gags tailored to the camp, and Bing gets everybody happy right at the start. Bing has always made a point never to talk down to his Army audiences. He knows they're as sharp on the uptake as they can be. "They're hep" he's always repeating. For instance, at a camp show the other day Bing was introducing Faye Mackenzie, and the boys were giving her a real noisy welcome. When the roar died down, Bing complained, "Now what's Faye got that I haven't got?"

"Hair!" yelled back a soldier almost before Bing got the words out of his mouth.

Bing has even gone so far in his consideration for Army audiences as to tidy himself sartorially for his camp shows. That's sensational if you know Bing, who usually prefers to work dressed something like the Northern Lights going South with a gaudy sport shirt and outfits built for comfort, not style. One day coming into an Army camp town he was strolling down the main drag with his suit looking like an old pair of wet-wash pajamas, his hat on the back of his head and a day or so's crop of blond whiskers on his cheeks. Crowds who'd heard the news of Bing's arrival ran up the streets looking for him, but they all passed right on by without suspecting that the disheveled fellow ambling along was the mighty Bingo himself. One citizen even came up to him—on the nose . . .

"Say, Bud," he asked, "have you seen Bing Crosby around? They say he's in town."

Bing laughed and gave him the old Hollywood thriller chase line, "He went that way." And darned if the guy didn't run off where Bing had pointed!

Since then Bing has started slicking his sparse locks and wearing ties and pressed suits, when he goes out among 'em. He has even dolled himself up in a white coat, tux pants and patent-leather shoes a few times, at big Army camp shindigs.

Probably the thing that's most surprising of all about Bing's reformation, though, is his fussy concern with time. Bing used to have small regard for the ticking of clocks. In fact, he never wore a watch, always said, "Why? There's always someone around who can tell you the time." But he's extra fussy about keeping soldiers waiting around. He knows spare time in an Army camp is precious.

Besides his camp appearances, Bing has taken it on himself to become a handy man for the soldiers overseas, boys he can't reach with his gravel notes. They're always writing him letters and requesting the darndest things—but Bing manages to come up with the answer somehow.

There was the bunch in the Aleutians who needed a trunk full of sound effects for their local radio shows—car-honks, train toots, auto smashes and even screams. They could have written any number of Hollywood radio people—but somehow they picked on Bing. So he and Larry went around to the radio stations in Hollywood and got together the darndest collection of gruesome sounds you ever heard and shipped them right out. He got a request a while back for a flock of his own records, preferably autographed. Well, Bing lost most of his own platters when his house burned down, and as anybody knows most of the numbers are as rare in music stores as nylons at a hosiery counter. Just the same Bing put the bite on his friends, relatives and even himself and shipped them off as near a complete selection as he could find.

Just about the fastest writing and recording of a song that ever took place in Hollywood can be hung up to the credit of Bing and those song writers of his, Burke and van Heusen, when the Seventh Air Force in New Guinea gave them a buzz. It was 7:30 one recent morning when Bing's phone jingled and the operator said "New Guinea calling." Captain Charlie Erb, a former USC All-American footballer, was on the wire. He said the Seventh Air Force simply had to have a song of its own pronto —and they wanted one by Bing. Bing doesn't write 'em, but he did the next best thing—turned it over to Burke and van Heusen, who came up with a special anthem by 12 o'clock noon. Bing recorded the tune during his lunch hour, and the master record sailed away by bomber that afternoon to the South Pacific!

Those are the kind of war pitches you seldom hear about around Hollywood but which stars, not only Bing, but a lot of others, too, are always coming up with. Bing hasn't had a placid lunch hour for weeks. There's usually a Bond rally short to be made or a war song to be recorded somewhere around the lot, or a bunch of Army visitors who want autographed records or a personal earful of Bing's up-and-down notes. Bing was going over some songs on the set of "The Road to Utopia" the other day when a messenger came on the set and handed him a note. "From the O.W.I." he said.

Everybody wanted to know then what Bing had to do with the O.W.I. Turned out, he'd been special consultant to the O.W.I. on camp shows for the past eight months, but he'd never got around to mentioning it! Bing has even busted some rules of his for his private war effort. He posed the other day for a cigarette advertisement—which he'd always refused to do before—so the boys overseas would get a million smokes. And he gave his precious throat a beating at a big Hollywood service benefit show the other night when the flu bugs had it sore and husky, and Bing registered a temp of a hundred and something. But he sang just the same.

One thing that fascinates Bing particularly about any element of life he gets interested in is the lingo. Bing's talented in the word department—just naturally. That mixture of deep erudition and station-house slang that he sends out over the air is not written for him. That's the way

Bing talks. His pals have always been amazed to accompany Bing about the stalls and paddocks of race tracks and hear him chatter with the grooms, jockeys and touts in the fantastic language they use. Bing's really a great mimic and impersonator and authority on all kinds of slang, from Deep Brooklyn to Mid-Texas and back again. Right now he's got G.I. Joe's lingo down so pat that no matter what they toss at him, he can toss it right back. It's this burning curiosity that makes him always pick the enlisted men's messes to eat in and their recreation halls and barracks to bum around in when he's on tour. But he gets along with the gold-braid every bit as cozily.

hero's hero . . .

In fact, Bing's most rabid fan is an Air Corps lieutenant who announced himself as such, some time ago when he came to Hollywood on the way to the battle fronts. At the time Bing was shooting "The Road to Morocco," and when he heard about this flyer-admirer, he had him come on the set, as he always does whenever a soldier on leave arrives in Hollywood and manages to contact Bing. There Johnny Burke, Jimmy van Heusen and Bing were smoothing out the rough edges of "Moonlight Becomes You"—so they ran over it for this chap before the public ever got an earful of it.

Well, this officer was so hopped up over it that he promised Bing to bag four Jap planes especially for him. Then he left, and Bing never heard much about it for awhile until he read that this pilot really had bagged four Jap planes and dedicated them to Bing. He'd called his killer machine "Bing Crosby's Curse." That thrilled Bing to the core, but guess what thrilled the aviator—the victories? Well—later Bing was beaming one of those short-wave overseas broadcasts to the boys, and he happened to sing "Moonlight Becomes You."

He got a V-mail letter pronto.

"I had the most amazing experience in the jungle the other night," it read. Bing thought some tingling tangle with the Jap Zeros was what he meant. But the letter went on, "I was sitting deep in the bush and out of my radio came your voice singing 'Moonlight Becomes You'! I could hardly believe it. To think that I, way out in that jungle, heard you sing that song before anybody else in the world!"

That's what thrilled him—more than bagging the four planes! And things like that thrill Bing, too—to know that a throaty old thrush like himself isn't ready for the glue pot yet and doesn't exist just to make teen-age tootsies sigh into their chocolate malts. The respect that a lot of red-blooded guys hold for him is a very solid article, whether he knows it or not. That was proved a bit back when Bing and Larry put on a show at a desert camp near Hollywood.

There they met a general in command who struck them as just about the highest type of soldier they'd ever run into. A man of rare personal charm and power, he was loved and respected by all his men to the point of worship. Yet he was tough, a strict disciplinarian and a harder worker than any five men in his command.

It seems this general hadn't had one day's leave in two years since the war started—not an hour. He was devoted to duty and didn't dare have one tiny thing go wrong with his camp—so he never left for a minute and worked all hours. The Crosbys fell for him just like the soldiers, got to talking and discovered that the general's son was due to graduate from West Point in a week or two.

"I'd sure like to see that," said the general. "But," he laughed, "I haven't got a decent uniform to wear. Haven't been away long enough to buy myself a suit of clothes, and the desert's ruined the ones I have."

That set Larry and Bing to thinking, so they put a proposition up to him. If they got a pledge from his men that they'd be on their honor to keep things at the camp ticking like clockwork, would the general come over to Hollywood and get himself outfitted and let them show him around? The general laughed "Okay" so they buzzed around, got the pledge from the men—no job at all. And the general took a trip to the tailor's in Hollywood, where Bing entertained him. He got his new duds and later on a long overdue leave to see his boy graduated at West Point! Needless to say, the men at that camp lived up to their end, too. Not one G.I. was out of line a minute while the general was away.

Bing's biggest ambition these days is to take a trip overseas to the battle fronts and bring his brand of melody up where the slugging is going on. Especially since his pal, Bob Hope, got back to Hollywood with heart warming tales galore of his North African tour. So far radio, movie and local camp programs have kept Bing rooted to his home shores, but he's getting pretty impatient, and right now he's working on a deal to make a salty expedition possible.

g. i. double . . .

He doesn't care where he goes—but if it's to the Mediterranean sector, he's likely to run right into himself. Other day he got a letter from a soldier there, Private Lee Jones of Illinois.

"I was driving up to a British refueling station in our jeep," wrote Jonesie, "when four little Arab kids ran out and wanted to know if I was Bing Crosby. Of course I said 'no,' but because I do look like you and have always been kidded about it, my buddies in the jeep with me said that's just who I was. So these Arab kids, in perfect English, break into a solid quartet rendition of 'When the Blue of the Night Meets the Gold of the Day'!

"That got such a howl out of my buddies that they've kept on insisting that I'm you, ever since. So if the story gets around that you're in North Africa—I want you to know how it started."

That letter didn't make Bing Crosby a bit mad—he thought a dough-boy-double was a swell idea. At this point his staggering daily schedule could do with a couple dozen extra Bing Crosbys. And so could the boys in uniform, from all reports.

young lady, and tucked her in for her nap. That night the identical dish of cereal was again presented to a pout-mouthed, arch-eyebrowed young lady. Hunger won, and with that capitulation, little Miss Detlie learned one of her first bits of philosophy: Take advantage of what you have while you can.

One of the next lessons that Veronica Lake taught her intelligent infant was the right of ownership. Around her house Veronica had placed several valuable specimens of bric-a-brac, and she had no intention of removing them because of the clutching hands of a small daughter. "No, no," she said quietly when Elaine made a pass at a blown-glass pigeon, "that is Mommy's. This is Elaine's." And she handed the young lady a Raggedy Ann doll.

QUESTION: "Should oil be used all over baby's body daily?"
ANSWER: 3 out of 4 physicians said yes—helps prevent dryness, chafing. (Most important—antiseptic oil helps protect skin against germs).

QUESTION: "Should oil be used after every diaper change?"
ANSWER: 3 out of 4 physicians said yes. (Antiseptic oil helps prevent diaper rash caused by action of germs in contact with wet diapers).

QUESTION: "Up to what age should oil be used on baby?"
ANSWER: Physicians said, on average, "Continue using oil until baby is over 6 months old." Many advised using oil up to 18 months.

ANSWER: 4 out of 5 physicians said baby oil should be antiseptic. Only one widely-sold baby oil is antiseptic—Mennen. Helps check harmful germs, thus helps prevent prickly heat, diaper rash, impetigo, other irritations. Hospitals find Mennen is mildest, safest, keeps baby's skin smoothest. Special ingredient soothes itching, smarting. Use the best for your baby—Mennen Antiseptic Oil.

Raggedy Ann lost the decision to the pigeon, and a chubby hand moved toward the table with determination while a pair of China-blue eyes turned toward Mommy. Mommy shook her head. "I told you that birdie belonged to Mommy. If you touch it, I'll spank the baby's hands."

Elaine stared at her mother for several seconds while she weighed the chances of the threat being carried out. In the past she had discovered that when Mommy said she was going to spank, zowie! she did just that. Just enough to make a chubby hand sting, you understand, but quite sufficient to joggle an infant's dignity.

Elaine glanced quickly from her mother's serious face to the pigeon. Such a lovely pigeon, shining and smooth and tabu. Elaine grabbed it and jerked it onto the carpet. The guardian angel of pigeons and small girl's fingers must have been on the job because the glass didn't break.

Mommy arose to her full five feet one and advanced upon the culprit. "I said that I'd spank you if you touched that—remember?" she remarked. Then, deliberately and with a measured pressure, she spanked Miss Elaine's hands.

The little lady yowled with rage. "Raggedy Ann is yours," said Mommy Veronica, setting the doll beside Elaine.

"I want my pillow," said Elaine between sobs. So Veronica got the pillow and handed it to her daughter. This pillow has a history. It was one of the first things Veronica made during Elaine's pre-stork days, and it matched the blue bassinet. As Elaine emerged from babyhood, the one possession to which she clung on every possible occasion was her pillow. To this day, when she is tucked in at night, she cuddles this pillow. There may be a panda, a teddy bear or a doll in her trundle bed, but the roll call isn't complete until she has her pillow.

The pillow naturally represented Veronica's Sunday punch. She decided that, the next time the little lady appropriated something that didn't belong to her, Mommy would lay possessive hands on the pillow, thus bringing the problem home in terms the juvenile could understand. However, this wasn't necessary. Little Miss Detlie got the idea after one positive treatment.

Sometimes this portion of her ethical training has funny results. She is the soul of generosity, so when she goes calling on some of the neighborhood children, she always carries along several of her most treasured toys. "This is for you," she will say with a cherubic smile. "And this is for you, and you, to play with." But when she is called for, at the end of the visit, she solemnly gathers up her belongings—sometimes over the protest of recipients who don't understand the Detlie logic—and takes them home.

The acid test of a little girl's viewpoint on possessions is applied by Veronica's collection of dolls. Not yet have glass cases been made to house the 50 different representatives of doll craft that Veronica started to assemble when Elaine was born. Eventually the collection will belong to The Fair, The Lovable when she has reached an age of appreciation. Among the dolls is an Indian with a crumpled face made from a prehistoric McIntosh or maybe a Delicious apple. There are a number of stocking-faced dolls typical of different peasant types. At present, in a shop in New Orleans which specializes in such manufacturing, a complete set of presidential dolls and their wives is being constructed.

Once that array from Washington, George—complete with powdered wig—to Roosevelt, Franklin Delano—complete with cigarette holder—is completed, Veronica wants to start a collection of European historical dolls.

Another collection currently fascinating to Veronica, which will be passed on eventually to Elaine, is a gold charm bracelet. So far it consists of a gold jeep, a perfect miniature reproduction of the Air Corps' B-19 (complete with insignia), a hula dancer wearing a fine gold chain skirt, a hurdy-gurdy man with a tiny monkey at the end of an equally delicate chain, a St. Christopher medal, a four-leaf clover, a wishbone, a pirate's chest, a champagne bucket, an ice-cream freezer, a cross and heart-shaped locket that belonged to Veronica as a child, a book that opens into a locket, a covered wagon and an 8-ball. Elaine's favorite—there's no accounting for a sub-deb's taste—is the 8-ball. Veronica trusts that this is no forecast of the young lady's future.

Incidentally, Elaine now wears her first article of jewelry, a slim gold band in which is set a tiny chip diamond. She had admired Veronica's jewelry for so long that Veronica decided to test her daughter's ability to take care of fine things. The ring was not expensive in view of the danger of its being lost. However, that danger now seems remote. Elaine treats the ring in the manner of a trainer caring for the favorite on Derby Eve.

When Veronica is going out in the evening, Elaine is allowed to remain up long enough to watch the preparation. She is feminine incarnate in her love of pretty clothes. She tries on her mother's gloves, her shoes and her tiny hats. Her eyes are moons of wonder as she observes the dress Veronica is wearing.

"Mommy's dress sooooo pretty," she breathes. "Mommy's hair sooooo pretty. Mommy so pretty."

pint-sized pretties . . .

Elaine is now getting large enough to wear half of the mother-daughter clothing sets that have become so popular. Currently the two lovelies each own a brown tweed suit with matching topcoat and a white wool suit with a series of bright blouses.

When Elaine first tried on her suit, she gazed at her mother in rapt admiration. "Mommy's pretty suit," she said in her accustomed refrain. Then she marched to the full length mirror and scanned her diminutive self. She turned 'round and 'round. Then she nodded. "Me pretty, too," she announced with critical satisfaction.

Their slack suits are currently identical, and those who have seen half-pint Veronica and gill-sized Elaine strolling along hand in hand, wearing their sport togs, recommend the sight.

One Sunday they were driving the short distance from Grandmother Keane's to the house which Veronica and Elaine share with Carol Ann and Rita Beery, when Elaine spied a pony driving ring and demanded a ride. As she was too small to be trusted on the pony alone, Veronica climbed into the saddle and held her daughter on her lap. Around and around they went, the fat pony loping along beneath two laughing riders.

After the ride, Veronica passed a small knot of observers. One high school kid said to the other loitering nearby, "You're right—she's just a kid. I thought at first I'd seen her around school or somewhere. Gosh, her little sister sure looks like her, doesn't she?"

Of her mother's considerable status as a celebrity, Elaine is completely oblivious. Veronica has always kept movie magazines around the house in profusion, and Elaine goes through them with the same enthusiasm with which she attacks her comic books. "Picture of Mommy," she croons to herself. "'Nother picture of Mommy. Pretty Mommy."

repeat performance . . .

She has been a frequent and very welcome studio visitor, and she has never yet spoiled a take by pouring a treble ad lib into a horrified microphone. "When the bell rings, you must be very quiet. You mustn't cough, nor chuckle nor speak a word," Veronica had warned her.

"Okay, Mommy," said Elaine. Several evenings later, Veronica overheard the small trouper going over the instructions to her dolls. Silence having been achieved among the ranks of Raggedy Anns and pandas, Miss Elaine went through a brisk drama of her own authorship.

She is a great mimic, and she wants no interference. One night Veronica was waltzing around the house singing one of Elaine's specials: "Shoo-Shoo Baby . . ."

Elaine listened as long as she could, then took a fistful of her mother's skirts and jerked. "You not sing, Mommy," she ordered. "Baby sing."

Aside from "Shoo-Shoo, Baby," Elaine's repertoire contains a song called "Piston-Packin' Mama." (Mr. Linotyper, please don't change that word. Elaine doesn't say "pistol." She insists that it's "piston.")

The radio is one of her great sources of amusement. She can turn it on and tune it in to the program of her choice, which is always jive. As soon as the program changes, she finds another swing session.

She has never been really ill. But, having observed the signs of illness in others, she occasionally turns the knowledge to good advantage. Veronica asked the young lady to pick up her toys and put them away one evening, whereupon Elaine looked as piteous as possible and explained in a funereal voice, "No, Mommy, can't. Baby got tummy ache." (Groan.) "Baby got headache." (Groan.)

And in other ways she is exhibiting the arch beginning of feminine wiles. When Veronica came in from the studio one afternoon, Elaine met her with a rush of affection. The Mommy-pretty routine was gone over thoroughly. The Mommy-so-feet (which is Elaine's version of sweet) routine also got a workout. Then, after the briefest pause appropriate, The Diplomat added, "Mommy give Elaine candy?"

Her spurts of affection have to be allowed to arise without encouragement from Veronica, and in this respect she is her mother's own daughter. Veronica told Rita Beery one day, "I understand Elaine because she is exactly as I was. In hundreds of small ways she shows it."

If Elaine feels affectionate, she will caress her mother with great concentration for a few moments, then walk away without a backward glance to become engrossed in something else. If Veronica tries to instigate an emotional passage with her daughter, if she catches the baby at play and swoops her up, Elaine's expression is one of passive forbearance. She doesn't like it, but she tries to be polite about the interruption.

Unlike some children, Elaine has never been afraid of animals. She will make friends with the mangiest cur or the most moth-eaten cat alive; placing two dimpled hands on her knees, she will bend over to dog's-eye level and carry on an involved conversation in that language held secret between small children and friendly animals. So specific has her observation been that she became the life of one of her embarrassed mother's parties.

Elaine, dressed in organdy, ribbons and ruffles, had been allowed to make an appearance and conducted herself with great charm. Relaxing, Veronica turned to the group with which she had been talking, after noting that Elaine was making up to a celebrated male guest who had just asked her if she had a dog of her own.

A few seconds later Veronica heard a burst of hilarious laughter. Turning around she discovered her dainty daughter crawling along the floor on all fours. Occasionally she stopped at a chair and sniffed the leg in innocent mimicry of canine behavior. "Me a doggy!"

bogie sweeper . . .

Of one thing she was, for a long period, violently afraid. Veronica thinks that someone in the household in Seattle must have run a vacuum sweeper at Elaine when she was a crawling infant. At any rate, she used to scream and tremble every time the machine was turned on. Veronica thought it over, then perfected a stratagem. She brought the sweeper into her bedroom and left it there, instead of storing it in the closet. Occasionally, after Elaine stopped shying away from it, Veronica took her for rides around the house, without turning on the power. Then came the day when the power button was pushed, and the vacuum bag shwooshed out as the brushes began to worry the carpet.

Elaine must have felt much as Dr. Jekyll's wife did upon her first sight of Mr. Hyde. Here was a dear and familiar thing turned into a vivid monster. She opened her small mouth and uttered a large bellow, so Veronica pushed the switch to turn off the power. Then she showed Elaine how to control the panting beast. That did it. Elaine laughed. But she still doesn't like it.

Veronica's small daughter has been a great influence upon Veronica's choice of friends. Elaine is usually an excellent conversationalist, replete with anecdotes about birdies, horsies and other fascinating fauna. This evening, Veronica's tilted ear could catch no glib soprano despite the bass attempts to chat.

As she entered the room, Veronica was astonished to see her daughter rise from the floor where she had been studying a book, glower at the visitor and say, "Men!" closing the epithet with the emphatic hissing sound of a small, very disgusted cat. Veronica hasn't been out with the man since.

On the other hand, one chap whom Veronica has known for a long time is looked upon as Elaine's prized possession. The instant he arrives she deposits herself in his lap with the observation that he is so pretty. He also smells nice. And his watch has a most entrancing tick.

Sometimes Elaine's devotion results in highly intimate disclosures. Her apple-of-eye gentleman excused himself after dinner one evening and proceeded to a small room at the end of a corridor. Elaine followed him to the landing and waited. The general conversation paused when someone asked where the gentleman had gone. "He has gone," called Elaine in clarion tones, "to the bathroom." When one is 30 months old, normal conduct is treated without the inhibitions of 30 years.

And so, at the end of the day, a very small, very busy young woman gets buttoned into sleepers. She kneels at the side of her bed and says, "Now I lay me" to the last amen without a falter. "God bless Aunty Rila" (she has never called Mrs. Beery 'Rita'), "God bless Cara Ann, God bless Mommy and God bless Daddy."

Pointing to the picture of John Detlie which stands on her dresser, she says proudly, "There's Daddy."

Then she kisses Veronica rapturously, clutches her pillow tightly in small, round arms and goes off to sleep. Veronica, kissing the bronze curly head, breathes that sigh which every mother will understand. Out of a world filled with bewilderment, chaos and heartbreak, there is still one perfect thing—a sleeping child.

sarge. The kid stuck out his arm, failed to find a shoulder to stop it and fell right over on his face!

"Wake up, soldier," snapped the sergeant. "This ain't Dreamland. This is the Army!"

Well, to be fair, it was kind of tough for Donald O'Connor to get himself strictly on the beam that Monday morning, his very first as a soldier for Uncle Sam. Small Fry had had himself a man-sized week-end—yes indeed! Even a sharp show business kid who has done and seen about everything in his 18 years and knows all the answers, like Don, had to admit that for three dizzy days life had slapped him on a merry-go-round—a very pleasant one, sure enough—but guaranteed to make anybody stumble and stutter. Because, look what had happened:—

In three short days Don O'Connor had: One, finished up "The Merry Monahans," his last jumpin', jivin' Universal picture for the duration. Two, he'd knocked off a knockout farewell broadcast with Bing Crosby. Three, he'd signed a brand new studio contract guaranteeing him full salary every week he's in the Army. Four, he'd married the most wonderful girl in the whole world. Five, he'd joined the Army of the United States; and six, he'd finally passed his exams for what he wanted to be more than anything else in the book—A U.S. Air Corps flying cadet.

No wonder Don got his time signals all mixed and had to wait in the dawn's early light for the California-Mexico border to open so he could get married in Tia Juana. No wonder he found himself on his honeymoon without a pair of pajamas to his name, and had to use a pair of his bride's fancy chiffon numbers. No wonder—well, leave us face it—Small Fry—with love and the rush of events, was all mixed up like a chef's salad. And to avoid that chaotic condition ourselves, let's start at the beginning of what's the most thrilling event in Donald O'Connor's already thrill-packed young life (or at least a toss-up with becoming a flyer-cadet)—his marriage to pretty little Gwen Carter.

Don's heart went into a tailspin the moment he laid eyes on Gwen, and it has stayed that way, flopping around helplessly for over a year now. If you could see Gwen, you'd understand why. She's a little dream dish, sweet 17, with skin like the cream you used to get, eyes black as jet beads, real golden red hair and a young Venus figure that Don swoons is "out of this world." It really comes as close to a young edition of a Petty girl drawing as anything I can think of. She has a low, musical voice, a wonderful smile, and—well—one look and listen would melt a banker's heart.

hollywood at vine . . .

That was about a year ago and Cupid picked—of all places—the El Capitan theater on Vine Street, right above Hollywood Boulevard, to draw a bead with his bow and arrow. It was at a tryout for some new acts in Ken Murray's "Blackouts" that Don first saw Gwen and started breathing irregularly. He was there to help with the audition of an old vaudeville pal of his family's, and Gwen's stepfather, Carleton Kelsey, led the band in the pit. Gwen herself was sitting with a girl friend of hers, Joyce Elaine—who did a specialty in "Blackouts"—watching the tryouts. Don knew the girl friend, Joyce Elaine, so he got an introduction.

At that time, Don O'Connor was strictly fickle in the heart department. He'd had a girl on the string, of course, ever since he was able to toddle around. The gals had always tumbled for Don's glamour, good humor and worldly charms.

Anyway, they all vanished like a dream when he saw Gwendolyn Joyce Carter. And for the first time in his life, Don O'Connor was too knocked out to turn on the charm. He was even too upset to ask Gwen for a date. Instead he croaked to his friend, Joyce Elaine,

"Get me her phone number!"

Joyce shook her head. "I couldn't do that without asking Gwen."

"Then," gasped Don, "give her MY phone number. Tell her to call me."

"She wouldn't do that. You don't know Gwen."

Don didn't know Gwen, not at all. He had always been independent himself with girls, but he forgot that girls can be independent with boys, too. Gwen had plenty of beaux at Los Angeles High where she went to school. Her best boy friend at the time was Tommy Breen, son of the Hays office boss, Joe Breen. When Don finally traced down Gwen's phone number that afternoon and called that night for a date, Gwen wasn't impressed.

"Yes, I remember you," said Gwen sweetly. "No, I'm sorry I have a date tonight." That was a fib. Gwen didn't have a date because her mother didn't let her have dates except on Saturdays and Sundays. But she knew about Don O'Connor, and her private opinion was that he was a stuck-up young movie star.

Don called the next night and the next and the next. Every time, Gwen said sweetly, "I'm sorry, but I'm busy." By then Don was fit to be roped and tied and tossed in a padded cell. And only when he got a little humble and desperate did Gwen give in.

two strikes . . .

They went out to dinner on their first date, a Saturday night. Don arrived slicked and combed and dressed in his Sunday best, and he brought along a soldier friend of his for moral support. They drove down to Chinatown and half way down—boom—it happened. A tire went flat as a Brown Derby pancake. The soldier pal offered to change it, but that would show up Don as a sissy so he wrestled with the tire himself and ended up looking like a garage mechanic in the rush hour. When they finally ate dinner, everybody was starved, and Don's coat was ripped, his shirt streaked with grease, and all in all he was a mess. It was a very bad start. He drove home with an empty feeling that he'd fumbled the ball. Instead of impressing the lady with his grandeur as a movie star, he'd ended up looking and acting like a greaseball. But at home Gwen chuckled as she told her mother about the big evening. "He's cute," she said.

But girls are funny—as everyone knows—and maybe that's why Gwen and Don hit it off from the start. Don never got a chance to be a movie star with Gwen. Something always seemed to go wrong. Take the time he planned a big ski trip to the mountains. Don had been working day and night for months, but finally they told him a two-day breather was coming up. He planned to take Gwen on a trip to Lake Arrowhead for snow sports.

Well, there had to be a chaperone. First, it was Brownie, Don's stand-in, and his wife. But then Brownie's wife got sick. Then Jack, Don's brother, and his wife Millie said they'd chaperone the kids. But at the last minute Jack had to work in a picture. Don was frantic. Finally Don's mother, Mrs. O'Connor, volunteered and off they went. But the minute Don and Gwen and Mrs. O'Connor arrived at Arrowhead, Don's car broke down. He had to spend all day Sunday working on it so they could come back Sunday night—no skiis, no nothin'—and again the big event was fritzed.

What Don didn't realize until he knew Gwen better was that she didn't give a whoop about glamour or movie stars or the high life. All that counted with Gwen was what people were like. She's a sensible young lady. Gwen was born in Miami, Florida, and she's been educated in private schools in New York, Chicago, Atlanta and California. When she was nine, she took a trip to Europe. At times in her childhood she has been used to plenty of money, and that sort of thing doesn't bother her a bit. In fact, in spite of her dreamy looks, Gwen has never had a speck of movie ambition with it all around her in Hollywood.

Gwen's mother, Lillian Kelsey (who looks like Gwen's sister), works at Twentieth Century-Fox, and when Gwen and Don got a little too serious too early, she thought it might be good medicine to get Gwen a screen test at the studio and take her mind off marriage. The test was fine, and the studio said they'd give Gwen a stock contract. But Gwen just never got around to coming back out to the studio.

glitter for gwen . . .

Don asked Gwen to "go steady" on their fifth date. They were really engaged then, as far as Gwen and Don were concerned, but neither Mrs. O'Connor nor Mrs. Kelsey were taking them seriously. That didn't happen until about four months ago when Don put the bite on his mother for $700.

"What for?" she asked.

"I want to buy an engagement ring," said Don. That's the first Mrs. O'Connor knew about how serious her son was about his girl friend. He got the $700 by the way, and Gwen got the ring.

But long before that they saw each other with the regularity of formal fiancés and acted that way, too. At first Mrs. Kelsey laid down the law: Saturdays and Sundays were "date nights." School nights Gwen had to stay in. She is a senior at Los Angeles High, and the home work in the last year is tough. Gwen has always had excellent health and a strong body (she's an expert swimmer, horseback rider, and she once won a prize at a diving match in England)—but Mrs. K. wasn't taking any chances. As for Don—he was tearing himself to pieces on the set almost six days of every week and tearing one of his three hopped-up cars apart with a wrench when he wasn't making faces. But in spite of that killer-diller schedule, he couldn't bear to see Gwen only on weekends. They finally high-pressured Lillian Kelsey into Wednesdays, too.

But as for fancy courtin'—that never did enter the picture. For one thing, neither Don nor Gwen smoke or drink. And by the way, that's one Mother-knows-best advice that paid off for Gwennie! Most of her high-school girl friends puff cigarettes, but when that problem came up on Gwen's 12th birthday, Mrs. Kelsey asked her to leave them alone. "How do you know?" she argued shrewdly. "Maybe the boy you fall in love with won't want you to smoke. There are boys like that, you know." Funny part is, Don O'Connor was one just like that. He hates to see a girl smoke or drink!

But with no vices like that, Don and Gwen were a cinch to stay away from the hot stuff hangouts and juke-heavens. Oddly enough, too, Don O'Connor never wanted to go dancing. Gwen's a good dancer, but Don, after jitterbugging around on the set all day, was just too tired to swing it for fun when it wasn't fun. So their dates, by most standards, were tame affairs—only they weren't tame to Don and Gwen. They took in movies and went to parties with Gwen's high-school set and Don's movie set. They ate in drive-ins and cooed over cokes at drug stores and malt shops. They made the beach fun-piers and tried out some of Don's hopped-up jalopy triumphs.

Naturally the course of true love never runs smooth, as the poet gent said. Don and Gwen had a few spats. Mrs. Kelsey could always tell when she came in on them in the front room of her apartment. If everything was rosy-dosy, Don would be slumped on the floor looking up at Gwen with a mesmerized, idolatrous stare. If they'd quarrelled, they'd be sitting on opposite sides of the sofa, quiet and miserable looking. There were romantic tragedies, too. For instance, the time that Gwen rashly stated that she could cook.

That harked back to once when Gwen was a little girl and her mother let her "bake a cake." The cake was pretty awful unless you planned to use it for a cornerstone, but the family bravely ate it up. They said it was swell. Remembering this, in a soft, domestic mood Gwen told Don she'd bake him a cake. And she did. The result was exactly the same. Mrs. O'Connor, Junior, has a lot to learn about cooking and sewing and such, and when Don arrived he had to tell the same kind of flattering fibs while he bravely tried to swallow Gwen's brick.

"Gwen," Don finally cracked, "Can I take the rest of this swell cake home? I want to show it to Mother."

"You don't want the whole cake, do you?" asked Gwen suspiciously. "Why not just take a piece?"

"No!" protested Don wildly, "the whole cake!"

So he took it and then made a hurried exit, and after he was out the door, Gwen burst into tears. She told her mother that she knew Don wanted the whole cake because he wanted to destroy it!

Don and Gwen wanted to get married long before they did—in fact, ever since they decided to "go steady." But they had both their families working against anything as hasty as that. Really, neither Mrs. O'Connor nor Mrs. Kelsey had much of a position to stand on in that respect. Don's mother had got married when she was 14, and Gwen's only a little later in life. People think she's Gwen's sister today, and they wear each other's clothes.

Mrs. Kelsey stalled Don and Gwen along with promises of "in a few months," and both she and Mrs. O'Connor knew they were safe from an elopement, because at the tender ages of Don and Gwen, their parents' consent is what counts. But there were signs that things were getting serious, and both mothers knew darned well if it came to a showdown, they'd never have the heart to spoil their kids' happiness. First Gwen started collecting herself a trousseau in a small way, and at Christmas Don helped out with a wonderful lush fur coat. Then, only a few days before they ran away, he drove up with a Ford car for Gwen. Everybody knew anything could happen soon. But they didn't know everything would happen all at once.

Then Don got his induction orders. He finished his picture, and the studio came through with a surprise. They told him they were going to write a contract that paid him his regular salary of $350 a week all the time he was under contract to Uncle Sam.

It was only fair. After all, Donald O'Connor has made Universal millions of bucks and worked his head off turning out pictures to beat the band. He went into the Army with a backlog of four unreleased hits. But the only way Universal could reward him heretofore was with bonuses. The government, you know, said studios couldn't raise salaries of movie stars. Anyway, Don found himself down at Superior Court one day hearing Judge Emmett Wilson tell him it was all very legal for him to cash a $350 check every week from now on until the war is over—whether he worked or not.

small fry . . .

Before he went to court, Don had rehearsed with Bing Crosby for the Kraft Music Hall, and after court he went on to do the "Small Fry" number with Bing—which was where Don came in. Because that was the number in "Sing You Sinners" that first made Don O'Connor a Hollywood star—away back when he was in knee pants. All in all, events were tying themselves up neatly.

It was Saturday evening when Don tried to act nonchalant as he told his mother, "I think I'll get married." He'd said it before, but this time Mrs. O'Connor had a suspicion or two. She smelled a mouse when she had heard the judge advise Don to tie up some of his studio salary and put it away.

"Oh," replied Don. "Mother's expenses go on just the same, you know." Mrs. O'Connor (who handles Don's salary checks until he's 21) knew her expenses never reached anything like $350 a week. Don had already bought her the house. She wondered what he would be needing money for. Then she knew. And now she said:

"You know I've devoted my life to your happiness. If marrying Gwen will make you happy, then I'm for it. But my advice as a mother is to wait until you're 21. You have lots of time—and remember you're going away to war."

Don didn't say anything. He went over to Gwen's house. There Don blurted right out, "Mrs. Kelsey, Gwen and I are going to get married—see?"

Gwen's mother tossed his words right back at him.

"Oh, so you're going to get married—see?"

Don blushed and said, "I mean, with your permission, of course." Well, what could she do? Fate, circumstances and war and the Army and all of it were stronger arguments than any that either cautious mama could put up. "We're going to keep it a secret," added Don.

"Oh, no you aren't," replied Mrs. Kelsey. "You can get married, but none of this secret stuff. That's not fair to Gwen." Don went on to explain to Mrs. Kelsey what she already understood—that the reason they wanted to marry in such a hurry was that he was going into the Army and he wanted Gwen to stay true to him. He felt, he said, he couldn't ask this unless they were married. He made a pretty good talk about it, and it made sense. They left the house with Gwen's mother's blessings, although by that time it was one o'clock Sunday morning—cold and windy. The last maternal act Mrs. Kelsey took care of was to see that Gwen was bundled up good and warm with a new gray slack suit under her new coat Don had given her. With Alan Kirk, an actor chum of Don's, for best man, they headed South.

It wasn't a very exciting elopement, since nobody was chasing anybody. But at that Don and Gwen felt their hearts flop when they arrived at the border station between San Diego and Tia Juana. The gates were locked. The guard said, "The border's closed." All their plans seemed to fade into the black night. Then the guard explained, "It's only four o'clock. You can't cross until six."

"Is that all? Why didn't you say so?" yelled Don. "Gosh—waiting's a pleasure!" So they crossed at six o'clock on the dot and found a Mexican justice of the peace who spoke English and proved that a Mexican marriage was all on the up and up with all kinds of official seals and letters and government decrees.

They left Mexico at 8 that morning, after a wedding breakfast at a lunch stand, and drove back home. At Del Mar, Don's luck caught up with him. His car broke down. He called his mother. But he didn't say what went on, only that he would be home soon. Mrs. O'Connor never knew Don was married until he walked in the house where a bunch of neighbors were visiting. But she had her suspicions. When Gwen walked in, she reached over at the coffee table. "Oh," she said, "let me see this book." And there flashing all over the room on her outstretched finger was that wedding ring.

the groom wore pink . . .

The happy bride and groom finally got a wink of sleep Sunday night at the Kelsey's (they couldn't find a hotel room in all Los Angeles), and it was only when he got ready for bed that Don found he didn't have any pajamas! Early in the morning, Mrs. Kelsey saw an apparition tip-toe out of the bedroom. It was Don in Gwen's nicest pink chiffon pajamas, peeping out from under Gwen's very best silk housecoat. He looked like a cross between a harem beauty and a misplaced mandarin. "I'm after some water," croaked Don. "My wife's thirsty!"

And then, after he'd run home to tell his mother good-by before he left for Fort MacArthur, Don came by his bride's house again. She was asleep. So he left her a note, telling her he was leaving.

The very first day, the Army took him off to Camp Haan for a big Army camp show that very night. On the way, coming through Los Angeles, Don again dropped by his bride's. He was lonesome already and wanted her to come along.

"I can't," wailed Mrs. O'Connor.

"Why not?" pressed Mr. O'Connor.

"I've got to go to school!" wailed Gwen.

Gwen will finish up high school this spring. She's going to stay with her folks until graduation.

no time for comedy . . .

As for Donald O'Connor, he won't be worrying much about his schedule from now on. The Army will take care of that. Don didn't get off to a very auspicious military start, I'll admit. First of all, he missed the bus at the Los Angeles interurban station the night after he got married and had to drive down to Fort MacArthur—and you know what his blissful coma did to him then—headed him up the coast toward San Francisco instead! But in spite of that and his awful drill errors and the sulfanilamide tablets he chewed all day and the serum shots they poured into him and his struggles with making a bed—in spite of all these early Army tragedies that beset every rookie—still Don managed to take and pass the Air Corps cadet exam that he'd flunked weeks before when he was trying to get in.

What Don flunked before, of all things, was "current events." Which is understandable, the way they've had him salted away from the great outside world on those Universal sound stages. But he caught up on his newspaper reading after that and went to town. Now he'll be a fighter pilot (he hopes).

So when he'll ever get to see his sweet, blushing bride and ever-loving wife, Gwen, the Lord only knows—that is for more than a quick "hello" and a "good-by."

When he got back home after his wedding, his older brother Jack, who is Patsy O'Connor's dad, started kidding him.

"Well, Don," he said, "I guess now that you're a married man, you'll start raising a family—eh?"

Don came right back.

"Sure," he said. "Isn't that what you get married for?"

That handed all the O'Connors a laugh—and they really like to laugh, even when their baby brother, the last one, too, gets married and goes off to war. It made Don's mother remember a jingle her husband, big Irish John O'Connor, used to hum when he felt all right with the world.

"Faith and begorra—when I'm dead and gone,
There'll be another O'Connor a-trottin' along!"

Well, and why not?

through the room, stacking files.

"Pop," Larry said. "Drink to the new reporter. Larry Stevens is back from the dead. No more obits for me, Pop. No more dead news—"

"Dead news?" Pop said. "What's dead news? Here's my file for 1845. For us it's dead news. But for the people who lived in 1844, it was the future. All news is like that. It's all there, stacked up waiting. Do you want next year's file, Larry?"

"Always kidding, eh, Pop? Next year's? I'll settle for tomorrow's paper, Pop. Twenty-four hours, what do you say?"

"I say," someone remarked, "that we're running out of beer. Let's get some more."

The street stretched like a dim lit ribbon into the night, and they linked arms, singing down the street. The stores lay dark and shuttered; the gas lights flickered fitfully. Down the street, near the corner, lights blazed on a gaudy hand-painted sign: EDEN GARDENS. And, under it, even more gaudy, a poster dangled against the wall: NOW—PROF. CIGOLINI AND SYLVIA—NOW! THE FUTURE REVEALED! THE PROFESSOR KNOWS ALL, SEES ALL, TELLS ALL!

The Professor was in the midst of his spiel when they entered. He was on the stage jabbering in the queer gibberish of the fortune tellers, while his assistant, Sylvia, stood immobile in a supposed trance, responding to his directions, answering his questions in a queer, dream-like voice. She was dressed in a soft, white, flowing gown, and the light seemed to melt over her. Larry stared at her.

And, still staring, he stumbled between her outstretched arms. He blushed violently. "I beg your pardon," he said.

From the stage, Cigolini said pompously: "Miss Sylvia accepts the apology. Of course, she is not even aware of your presence. Everything but my will does not exist for her at this moment."

lady in a trance . . .

Still staring at her, Larry said: "Then ask her—"

"About an affair of the heart?" Cigolini said slyly. "About a young lady?"

"Yes," Larry said slowly: "Whether a lady will lunch with me tomorrow?"

"Sylvia!" said Cigolini. "Answer!"

"Yes," said the girl. "Yes, she will . . ."

"Will she meet me at 'The Evening News' office?"

"Yes . . . she will . . ."

"And what time?"

"Ah!" cried Cigolini, "that is for the young man to decide with the young girl."

"I'd like to," Larry said. "Only I can't. The girl I'm inviting to lunch, you see, is in a trance just now!"

The cabaret exploded into laughter. Cigolini came roaring down from the stage to lead Sylvia off. But, standing close to her, so close that his lips almost brushed the curve of her cheek, he saw her mouth curl into a faint smile, and her head nodded slightly, and he called after her: "My name is Stevens. Lawrence Stevens. Ask for Larry!"

After that, the night exploded into song and raised steins of beer and the confused images of people shouting in his ear. They roistered about the town, and somewhere he lost the rest of them, and he found himself walking down the street, alone and in the darkness. Suddenly, he heard the voice calling: "Larry . . . Larry . . ."

He whirled. He saw then that it was Pop Benson, and he grinned. "You gave me a turn, Pop," he said. "What in the world are you doing around here so late?"

"Didn't you ask me for a paper?" Pop said. "Here. I saved one for you."

He watched Pop amble off into the night, and then he turned away, too, heading for his room. The newspaper flapped in his pocket, and he jammed it deeper in. "Good old Pop! Quite a character!"

It caught his eye the next morning. It wasn't the paper itself. It was his name, the neat by-line on the front page: "By Lawrence Stevens." He hadn't written anything for the front page yesterday! What was this? Sleepily he opened the paper. It looked somehow strange, different: It wasn't last night's "Evening News" at all. His eye caught the headline over his name: "Bandits Steal Cash at Opera House While Melba Sings." A chill ran down his spine as the idea formed hazily in his mind. This was today's paper! This was about news that was going to happen!

shadow of events . . .

For a moment he couldn't think. His story! And he hadn't even written it yet! Why, Melba's concert wasn't even on yet! He didn't know why or how, but somehow, somehow what he was holding in his hand was tomorrow's newspaper, with tomorrow's news today. In a frenzy, he climbed into his clothes and rushed down to "The Evening News" office. Outside, he remembered a line from the paper: "Today at eight-thirty in the morning, the city suffered an unseasonal snowstorm." He looked up to the sky.

It was beginning to snow!

At the offices of "The Evening News," Gordon, the editor, saw him come dashing in. Gordon stepped to the front of his office and roared: "Stevens!"

He came over breathlessly: "Have you seen Pop?" he said. "Anywhere?"

Gordon said icily: "Stevens, you're late. I hate reporters who are late."

"Sure," Larry said. "Where's Pop?"

Gordon's voice was frigid: "Stevens, are you drunk?"

"Drunk? Of course not. You'll see. Wait until I do my front page story on the Melba concert."

Gordon roared: "You're not going to the Melba concert. You're fired!"

"Fired?" Larry said. "I quit. Besides, you'll give me a raise. You'll see—"

The door slammed shut in his face. Quickly he went to his desk. He slipped the paper out of his pocket. Working hurriedly, he began to copy the story, writing it out swiftly. He was still bent over his work when Sylvia came in. "Mr. Stevens?"

He turned then and saw her, and for a moment he forgot about the story. She was beautiful, even more beautiful than he had remembered. He glanced up at the big clock. Melba's concert. He took her arm and hurried her out. "Listen to me: At the concert this afternoon, something is going to happen—"

"How do you know?"

"I know," he said.

She smiled: "Do you read the future, too?"

He looked across at her: "I can read one part of it. I'm going to see more of you."

At two o'clock Melba began to sing. One minute later Larry edged out into the lobby. At two minutes after two, three armed men ran in. They worked swiftly. A cop wandered in. A shot rang out. The three men began to run toward the exit. Larry grabbed Sylvia's arm and was out of the lobby almost with them. At two fifteen, he gave Gordon the story, all written, all ready for the press. At two seventeen, the police came roaring into "The Evening News" offices. They had a few questions for Larry Stevens.

How did he know a robbery was going to take place? Who were the men? Where were they now? What was his cut? Who was the brains of the outfit?

"What are you talking about?"

Inspector Mulrooney, his face like a bulldog's, grunted: "Who you trying to fool, sonny? You're in this up to your neck. How did you know about that robbery unless you were a part of it?"

"I just knew, I tell you."

"Well, just tell us how."

"I can't. You wouldn't believe it."

"That's a bright answer, sonny. You bet I wouldn't. Because there's only one answer. You set that job up yourself."

brig-time . . .

Three policemen closed in on Larry.

Sylvia said suddenly: "Wait a minute. I told him. I saw it. I'm clairvoyant sometimes. Working with Professor Cigolini—"

Inspector Mulrooney wavered: "You told him?"

"Yes," Sylvia said quickly.

"Don't believe her," Larry shouted. "She didn't have anything to do with it."

The inspector shook his head. "We'll take you both down," he said.

Larry looked out of the narrow cell window into the night.

"Larry . . . Larry . . ."

It was old Pop Benson. He smiled gently at Larry through the barred window.

"Well, Larry," he said. "You wanted the paper. Do you want tomorrow's, too?"

"Sure," Larry said. "Confessions of a jailbird—"

"It's all about how you were a hero, pulling an unknown woman out of the river. See, it's all here right next to the story about the arrest of those bandits . . ."

"Bandits?" Larry shouted. "Arrest? Where?"

"At the Union Bank. It says so here—"

Larry dashed to the door and began to hammer on it frantically. Inspector Mulrooney peeked in.

"Well?" he said.

"Will you let me out if I tell you where you can get those bandits?"

"Sure," Mulrooney said. "That's what I been telling you. This ain't no gag, is it? I almost believed that gal Sylvia. That girl can see things. She said she saw a woman jumping into the river tonight—"

"What?" Larry yelled. "She said that?"

He began to run. Mulrooney put out one surprised hand, but he brushed it aside, and he ran out into the street. He headed for the river. Sylvia! Crazy kid! Making that prediction. He could add it up. She was going to jump in herself.

He heard the sharp cry coming from the bridge while he was still a block away. There was a knot of people gathered about the center of the railing. He pushed through. Swiftly he climbed to the railing, swung himself over and off into space.

talking pidgeon . . .

He hit the water with a shock and clawed his way to the surface again. Something was moving there, a little off to the right. He could make out a woman's hair, vaguely familiar. Sylvia! He pulled up alongside of her, and then together, they swam to the small, dark wharf under the pilings of the bridge.

"You little fool," he said. "Why did you do it?"

"I had to," she said. "Otherwise they would never have believed me and you—"

"You were worried about me?" he said.

She nodded.

He said softly, again: "You little fool."

And then he kissed her.

At "The Evening News" office the boys were ragging Larry. They fired questions at him: How did he know about the robbery? How come he was at the bridge ready to dive in? Who was tipping him off to those things?

"Do you believe in miracles?"

They groaned: "Sure. You know a talking pigeon."

Larry said cheerfully: "Well, me and my pigeon are going to hit the old man for an advance."

One of the men grinned: "Not thinking of getting married, are you, Larry?"

"Could be."

The reporters exploded into jeers. "You know everything, Larry. Why bother the old man about a paltry hundred. Just get this pigeon to pick the five winners at the races tomorrow. That's all you need. Ought to be simple."

For a moment Larry stood tense: "Of course," he said in a low voice. "Why didn't I think of that?"

Then he was out of the office, looking for Pop Benson. Pop wasn't anywhere. He searched all over town. It was no use, and he dragged back to "The Evening News" offices late that night. He walked out into the dimly lit alley that led back to the street. Someone was there . . .

"Pop!"

The figure turned.

"Pop. I've been looking all over for you. I've got to get tomorrow's paper. It's the last time I'll ever ask for it."

"It won't do you any good, Larry."

"It's my whole future, Pop. I've got to get it."

"It won't do you any good . . ."

But he was holding the paper in his hand. Larry laughed aloud and snatched it from his hand. He thrust it deep into his pocket. He called gaily: "Thanks, Pop. Thanks a million."

"Remember," Pop said. "You wanted it. You took it."

"Sure. Take it easy, Pop. So long."

There was still time to catch Sylvia at the Eden Gardens. He waited in the wings, watching her. She was breathtakingly beautiful. She started to come off. And then as she passed him, he reached out and took her hand. She saw him then and for a moment they stood there in the reflected light of the stage, and he knew he loved her and always would.

staging a proposal . . .

"Darling," he said happily. "Will you marry me? I know this is a crazy time to ask and a crazy place to do the asking. But everything is crazy. I'm just a broke reporter now, and tomorrow I'll be a millionaire. Marry me, Sylvia—"

She hesitated just for a moment, and then she said: "I shouldn't answer this quickly, should I? It isn't proper. But—"

"You will!" Larry shouted. "You will. Darling, I'll give you anything you want. The world on a silver platter, the moon."

"Just give me a minute now," Sylvia said "to change."

He paced excitedly up and down in front of her dressing room. The paper! Of course. He should know the names of the horses. He'd write them down now. He opened it feverishly to the sports page. His eye ran down to the racing news. There they were. The winners. The winners of tomorrow's races! And he knew them now, long before the races were due to be run. Lamplighter . . . Mud Lark . . . Lightning . . . Ramona . . . Black Flash . . . He was made! He snapped the paper shut. The front page stared up at him. A headline caught his eye. For a moment it didn't make sense.

LARRY STEVENS, EVENING NEWS REPORTER, SHOT TO DEATH IN LOBBY OF ST. GEORGE HOTEL

Someone was poking a finger at his chest. Cigolini. What was he saying? Cigolini's face was wavering before his eyes. He realized that he was shoving the paper back into his pocket. That headline:

"I'll never go back to him ... never!"

Mother: There, there, what's Fred done to my little girl?

Wife: Nothing—that's the worst of it. He ignores me—treats me as if I weren't his wife—as if we'd never been in love. I can't stand it another day!

Mother: My darling, from all you've told me, I think it's my fault. There's something I should have explained. You know, a wife can often lose her husband's love because of one neglect. Most men can't forgive carelessness—or ignorance—about feminine hygiene.

Wife: You mean—I could have avoided all this?

Mother: Yes, dear. Now listen to me. My doctor always advises Lysol disinfectant for feminine hygiene. It cleanses so thoroughly, and deodorizes. It won't harm sensitive vaginal tissues, either—just follow the directions. You'll find Lysol is easy and inexpensive to use.

Husband (sometime later): How's about a kiss, dream girl . . .

Wife (to herself): Umm, everything's wonderful again—thanks to Mother's advice. She was right about Lysol—I use it always now!

Check this with your Doctor

Lysol is Non-caustic—gentle and efficient in proper dilution. Contains no free alkali. It is not carbolic acid. Effective—a powerful germicide, active in presence of organic matter (such as mucus, serum, etc.). Spreading—Lysol solutions spread and thus virtually search out germs in deep crevices. Economical—small bottle makes almost 4 gallons of solution for feminine hygiene. Cleanly odor—disappears after use. Lasting—Lysol keeps full strength, no matter how often it is uncorked.

SHOT TO DEATH . . . ST. GEORGE HOTEL . . . 6:25 P.M.

Cigolini was still talking to him. The manager of the Eden Gardens was pumping his hand. What were they saying?

"So you're going to marry Sylvia," the manager beamed.

"Sure is," Cigolini said.

"Come on out on stage" the manager said. "Let the crowd see you."

Where were they now? On stage? There were lights in his eyes . . . everyone applauding . . . what was the manager saying: "—the star reporter of 'The Evening News'—" "The Evening News"! That headline! SHOT TO DEATH . . .

The star reporter of "The Evening News," like a drunken man, walked straight to the footlights and then, without pause, kept right on walking, poised gracefully in midair for a moment, dropped five feet into the orchestra pit and made a huge thumping sound as he dropped through the taut skin of the bass drum . . .

wedding licenses and wills . . .

Twenty-four hours. That was all he had left in this world. Not even 24, really. But there was enough time left for a man to get married and provide for his—widow. He still knew the winners of the horse races. He'd make his million. What difference if he wasn't around to enjoy it? Sylvia would have it. SHOT TO DEATH . . . He shivered.

And so they were married. The bride was a vision of happiness. The groom? The groom looked just a little white around the gills. The preacher who was a man of wide experience thought Larry looked just a little peaked for a man about to become a happy groom. He thought it a little strange when Larry asked him how to draw up a will.

And Cigolini thought it a little strange when, after the ceremony, Larry bundled them all into a hansom bound for the race track. Didn't seem right for a fellow just married to be thinking of horses . . .

They reached the race track a little late.

"A hundred on Mud Lark," Larry said.

"Hey," Cigolini said. "That's a lot of dough. Takes a long time to spend a hundred bucks in singles."

"A lot of time . . ." Larry said wistfully.

"Take it easy. You're a married man."

Mud Lark paid 20 to one.

"The works on Lightning," Larry said.

Cigolini began to chatter: "Put some of it away," he said. "Save it for a rainy day."

"Let it ride," Larry said.

Lightning paid five to one.

Ramona? Won. Three to one.

Black Flash. By a nose. Even money.

The bookie paid them off in big bills. Sixty thousand dollars. He eyed Larry suspiciously. Larry took the money as if he didn't care about it at all. Just shoved it into his wallet, all that nice long green. The bookie winked to a friend; the friend began to move as soon as Larry started out of the tent.

The late afternoon sun smiled down benignly as they drove back to town. The trees were green and the flowers were blooming laughter in the fields. Larry sat slumped in the back. He kept seeing a headline: SHOT . . . SHOT . . . SHOT . . He held the wallet limply in one hand, the green of the bills showed through the top.

Behind them something clattered. A carriage swept even. A quick, grasping hand reached across. The wallet disappeared from his limp hand, and then there was only a whirlpool of dust to show where the other carriage had been. Cigolini shouted. The cab driver whipped at his horses with the shout. The other carriage careened far down the road. Larry was on his feet, staring curiously ahead.

A shot rang out; it nicked the wood behind Larry's head.

Cigolini yelled: "Get down. They're shooting."

"It's all right," Larry said. "This isn't the St. George Hotel."

Once in the city they almost lost the man as his carriage doubled around corners. The thief suddenly jumped. Larry was after him in a moment. Then it was a nightmare of alleys and doorways. In one, out the other; always that fleeing figure in front of him. Up stairs. Out to a roof. Then across the roofs of the city in a wild dash. Down a fire-escape. Then up to the roof again. The thief disappeared down a skylight. Larry followed, jumping. Locked in each other's arms, they dropped down a long sloping chute.

stalking death . . .

The fall jarred him. The thief was loose again. Larry, dazed, looked around him. A large room. The thief was running toward the door, a gun out in his free hand. Larry started for him. A shot. Wild. Larry ducked, still running. He ran full into someone in uniform. He rolled to his knees, completely dazed. He heard more shots. He saw someone in blue go by. The police. At the end of the long lobby there was a clock on the wall. Fascinated, Larry watched the hands drop a notch: 6:25. Then his eyes suddenly riveted on something on the floor beside him: a hat. A doorman's hat. Embroidered on it in gold thread was ST. GEORGE HOTEL.

A shot rang out.

Someone said: "That got him."

Then there were voices. Still dazed, Larry heard them: "Search the guy. Find anything? His wallet? Let's take a look at it . . ." Larry sat up shaking his head. He felt his body carefully. No. They weren't talking about him. They must have shot the thief. Still the paper said . . .

Someone was talking excitedly into the phone. He could hear the man's voice clearly: " 'Evening News'? Get this. Shot. Six twenty-five. Who? His name was in his wallet. Lawrence Stevens. Right . . ."

Very slowly Larry Stevens stood up. Because a thief had stolen his wallet and was later shot and because an excited man phoned the story into "The Evening News" without checking on it first, the headline would come out: LARRY STEVENS . . . SHOT TO DEATH . . . He began to laugh. He couldn't stop.

And so 50 years passed, and the whole family was downstairs waiting for them to come down to their Golden Anniversary, Old Larry and Old Sylvia now.

"Why shouldn't I tell them?" Larry said. "That's the way it happened."

"But how did those papers get printed . . . before there was anything to print?"

"I don't know."

"Why didn't you ask Pop?"

"Because," Larry said slowly, "Pop was dead. They found him dead in his room. Just an old man, dead of old age. Just an old man who didn't believe in time . . ."

and thought of the day she'd turned him adrift to shift for himself. "And boy, did he shift!" murmurs Aunt Tenny. "My nephew."

He was never the hellion type, far from it. A misunderstood yearling is what he thought he was. Youngest and skinniest of four brothers, he had no one to heckle, since he was also the skinniest kid on the block. Only when there was a gap in the team would the guys let him play.

"Aw, he's no good."

"Better'n nothin'."

"Yeah, but not much."

Bob thinks that's why he got such a terrific boot out of his own son's feat. Last winter he took Bobby, the elder boy, to visit his parents in Ogden. It was coasting weather, and the hardier kids used a drive so steep that when you reached the bottom, you went skimming four blocks on momentum. Bob took his youngster down that drive and hauled him back again. At the top, Bobby looked his father in the eye. "I want to go down by myself." He was three and a half.

"You can't."

"I can, Daddy."

What got Bob was the way he said it—no cockiness, just a quiet confidence that infected the parent in spite of himself. He told Bobby to wait, posted a couple of older kids at strategic points, and himself took a spot halfway down the hill.

Heart thumping against his ribs, calling himself all kinds of a fool, he yelled, "Okay!" Down came Bobby, steering like a veteran, past his Dad, past the other outposts, straight as an arrow to the bottom of the hill and beyond. Apprehension gave way to a surge of such exultant pride as Bob had never known—not even when Bobby and Michael were born. Going down to meet his son who came trudging up toward him, he thought: "He's the youngest kid ever to take this hill, and he wasn't scared. I'm his father. But he's more than just my kid. He's a person."

That's when the ghost voices sounded. "Better'n nothin'."

"Yeah, but not much." And that's when Bob laughed out loud.

At his son's age, he was a person, too—which was maybe the root of his trouble. He got kicked out of kindergarten—for what heinous sin he doesn't recall—but brother! when you get kicked out of kindergarten, you're an individualist. He played hookey from school. His folks couldn't understand why his grades were so poor, and he couldn't understand what was so important about it. It wasn't important to him. Nor to Adrian, his boon companion, who was also misunderstood and played hookey with him. When the family moved to Ogden from Salt Lake, he missed Adrian but continued to play hookey by himself. He and Adrian were just marking time anyway, till they could run away. The thing was to get out on your own. Free of pestering elders, the world was a wide and beautiful place.

dren that day. Nobody gave them a lift. So they hiked back to Las Vegas, by which time home with its regular meals didn't look so bad. But Bob had set out for adventure, and adventure he meant to have.

In his shoe was a silver dollar which even the pal of his bosom didn't know about. "Let's go in this store and grab a couple of Baby Ruths and run."

"We'll get arrested."

"They wouldn't arrest a couple of poor little children." Bob liked that line.

Ashen-faced, Adrian grabbed and ran—straight into Bob's arms. "Whatcha runnin' for? I got money to pay for a million Baby Ruths."

Drunk with freedom, Bob reached home to find his mother sick over his disappearance. He got mad at her for being sick. Then he got mad at his father. There was a good 20-buck car on the market, and he'd saved 20 bucks, delivering papers. Dad said he was too young for a car. Bob decided this was a kind of disease with parents, butting into their kids' affairs. He got a job, left home and boarded out. The elder Walker threw up his hands and called on a psychologist friend for help. That guy must have known his business. In no time at all, he had Bob home, bawling his eyes out.

But by now the family was walking on eggs. Aunt Tenny was drawn into their counsels and offered to send her maverick nephew to the military school her own boys attended—the San Diego Army and Navy Academy at Carlsbad. At first it was just a change of battling locale. Bob continued to skin his knuckles and crack his head against a world he'd never made and didn't like. Meantime, Virginia Atkinson, who taught dramatics, watched him with an understanding eye. And one day she said: "How would you like to read for a part in a play?"

the saving grace . . .

It was like sulfa drugs to fever, and a bottle to a famished babe. Six months later Bob didn't know himself. His grades had picked up, the chips were gone from his shoulders, the sun was out, he loved his fellow-man and worshipped Mrs. Atkinson. The whole thing looked like magic, but was perfectly simple. He'd found in self-expression the freedom his nature craved.

He stayed at Carlsbad five years and in interstate dramatic contests won best-actor award twice in a row. There was no doubt in his mind about what he wanted to do. But he was diffident, and Mrs. Atkinson was his oracle. He couldn't ask for the go-sign, he waited for her to give it.

She gave it one night when he drove her home from a performance. "You've got to decide if you're willing to face the heartbreak. All I can say is, I think you're good enough to be an actor."

Bob's reactions are quiet. "That's good enough for me," he said, and you couldn't have told that his heart was doing handsprings up in the sky.

The Pasadena Playhouse offered him a scholarship. Aunt Tenny offered him a two-year course at the American Academy in New York. He'd have liked to take both, but when you're 18 and New York beckons, you don't give her the air—not if you're in your right mind, you don't.

There was a girl in Tulsa named Jennifer Jones who wanted to be an actress. Her folks happened to send her to the Academy that same year. She and Bob met, attended classes together, fell in love, finished their first year and went hunting for summer jobs. Jennifer found one with a tent show in the Midwest. Bob was still luckier. He tried out for and copped the part of a skinny boy in a Broadway play. Jennifer was sick over missing the opening. They said good-by reluctantly and made a date for the fall. Three days later the Broadway producer said, "I'm sorry, Bob. We're changing this skinny boy to a fat boy."

Something happened then that hadn't happened since Bob was 13. He got sore at the world, marched out of the theater, down 44th to the Hudson. Nuts to the stage! He'd get on a steamer and go around the world. The steamer happened to be a United Fruit liner that didn't go round the world, just hauled bananas back and forth from Central America. By summer's end he'd sweated the peeve out of his system. Magnanimous, that was Bob. Ready to forgive. American Academy, here I come!

He'd reckoned without Aunt Tenny, whose word was her bond and who expected the same of others. By her standards, Bob had walked out on their deal, quit under his first blow. That made the deal invalid. He was on his own.

He had no squawk, thought she was perfectly right. American Academy, here I don't come. Jennifer decided not to go either. Practical experience, that was better than any old school. They got Paul Gilmore to let them put on "Springtime for Henry" down at the Provincetown. Boy, was that fun! Money? Don't be silly. Who makes money at the Provincetown? Besides, they didn't need any. Jennifer ate on what the family sent her. Bob lived at a Yonkers co-op and slung hash for his room and some of his meals. His good brother Walter, practicing law in New York, gave him ten bucks a week.

Then came the wire. Tulsa was opening a new radio station. Would Jennifer come back to star in a series of dramatic shows? Fourteen weeks at 25 a week. Bob thought it was wonderful and tried not to think what New York would be like without Jennifer. "Of course you must go."

"Maybe I must," she said, looking thoughtful. "But come on in here first."

In here was Western Union. She didn't write yes, and she didn't write no. What she wrote was, "Can you use a leading man?"

It turned out they could. Fourteen weeks later, with money in the bank, Bob and Jennifer were married in Tulsa and spent their honeymoon trying to crash Hollywood. Hollywood didn't know they were alive.

"I love New York," said Jennifer finally. "New York's got snow." So back they went.

Being poor didn't matter. Living in one room that cost 18 a month didn't matter. They were young and in love and all their beautiful life lay ahead. Daytimes Bob looked for work. Jennifer couldn't, because a baby was on the way. At night he synopsized movie scripts at six dollars a script. Jennifer helped.

One unforgettable day came an emergency call from a radio agent. Bob tore up and tore back with a check for 21 dollars. Five words he'd said. They figured it out on the back of an envelope. Four dollars and twenty cents a word—

"One word for a hat," said Bob. "We're going to buy you the best hat in New York for four dollars and twenty cents."

They took the bus uptown. The hat was blue with white ribbons. It cost four dollars, and the face underneath it made it look like a million.

lucky in love . . .

Radio began breaking. The day Bobby was born, his dad got three jobs, and they called him their good luck. By the time Michael came 11 months later, Bob was an established radio actor with five regular programs. In addition to youth and love, they now had two kids and a car and a house at Sands Point.

But Jennifer's craving to act was as strong as Bob's, and he had every sympathy with it. When Michael was old enough, she began trotting round to the agents again. One job she applied for was in the road company of "Claudia."

"Road company nothing!" said the agent, grabbing his hat. "Mr. Selznick's in town. Let's go see him about the picture."

Mr. Selznick grabbed Jennifer almost as fast as the agent had grabbed his hat. "Claudia?" Never mind "Claudia." Make a test of Miss Jones. Run the test of Miss Jones. Have Miss Jones come right up. Mr. Selznick wants to put you under personal contract, Miss Jones. "Under personal contract, Miss Jones." Those were the words, and the tune didn't matter, as Miss Jones and Mr. Walker waltzed round and round, to the wonder and admiration of their children.

When Jennifer was called to the coast to test for Twentieth Century's "Song of Bernadette," she took the kids along. If she got the part, Bob would close the house, store the furniture and try for radio work in California. Before Bernadette was settled, M-G-M's New York scouts had asked Bob to make a test. Not being the hero type, he thought his chances were slim. Besides, as a movie beginner, he'd get only a fraction of his radio earnings. But when M-G-M offers you a test, you make it. And when M-G-M offers you a contract, you may fall flat on your astonished face but you take it, and to heck with the dough.

He didn't let Jennifer know he was coming, wanted to surprise her. She practically fainted. "Bob! Where have you been? I've been trying to call you, Bob.

I got the part, darling! I'm Bernadette."

"And I'm under contract to M-G-M." So they fainted into each other's arms.

He got really steamed up when they gave him the script of "Bataan" at the studio next day. That night he read it aloud to Jennifer. Baby, what a part! He almost didn't get it, too. Played it too old when he tested. But Tay Garnett, the director, called him to the office and watched him as he talked. "You don't have to test again," he said at last. "The part's yours."

"Tay Garnett, that's my pappy," says Bob, and the way he says it, you can positively see the halo round Garnett's head.

storm in heaven . . .

Everything was happy and exciting then. Everything was perfect. A few years back Hollywood couldn't see either of them. Now the movie plum of plums lay in Jennifer's hands. "Bataan," introducing Bob Walker, was finished and about to be sneaked.

Sneak previews are just what their name implies. They're run for audience reaction. Players are supposed to stay away from their door. But information leaks out. In this case it leaked out to Bob Taylor, who took pity on the other Bob. "Come on, you can go along." Only the other Bob wanted Miss Jones along, too, so he hid her in the back seat of the car where Taylor found her.

"I thought a sneak preview meant you could sneak in," said Jennier meekly.

I don't have to tell you what the sailor did to that audience. If you saw the picture, he did it to you, too. M-G-M promptly cast him as Private Hargrove. Everyone said, how wonderful. Everyone said, those lucky lucky kids—they've got everything. Then the heavens split with one of those lightning bolts Hollywood never gets used to, though they're frequent enough, more's the pity. Bob and Jennifer separated.

Only they know why. We know only that few separations have saddened the town more. It's none of the town's business, but nobody who's seen them together can squelch the feeling that they belong together.

Of them, the old cliché is literally true. They remain friends. When Bob finished "Hargrove" and "Mme. Curie," he moved over to Selznick's to play opposite Jennifer in "Since You Went Away." He's a stickler for promptness. If he says he'll meet you at two, he'll meet you or break a leg. One day he came in 15 minutes late, and terribly upset. He was late because he'd stopped in to see Jennifer. He was terribly upset because she had a cold.

His Sundays are devoted to the boys. They're three and four now, but Michael's the same height and weight as Bobby, so they look like twins, and they're the twin apples of his eye. When Michael was named Michael, his parents vowed he'd never be called Mike. So he's called Mike. Of the two, he's rather more introspective. Music sends him off into daydreams, and he's got those bedroom eyes that say come-and-get-me. Bobby doesn't wait to be got. He goes after what he wants and what he seems to want most is people. Traveling to and from Ogden, he collected every heart on the train.

Bob's been kept too busy for much social life. By the end of the day he's generally too pooped for more than dinner and a book. When he can, he plays tennis with Peter Lawford or Cornell Wilde. Loves all forms of exercise, including walking, but finds walking in California a snare and delusion. It lacks the New York tingle.

He's a friend of Keenan Wynn's, and sooner or later any friend of Keenan Wynn gets the motorcycle bug. A car ran into Bob's bike while he was on it, and he got his head cracked and was laid up for three weeks. "Keep off it," the studio ordered. He said he would if they'd buy it. They said they needed it like they needed a bullet in the brain. "Then I'll be awfully tempted to ride it," said Bob. So they bought it.

He loves the piano and wants to take lessons, so he can play swing and more swing. His favorite writers are Saroyan and Warwick Deeping—even if they are sentimental—and Nancy Hale, because she's sophisticated. He goes for anything Brooksy in clothes, plain colors in ties and heavy wool socks all year round. Jewelry leaves him cold, except he thinks it would be classy to own a pair of nut-and-bolt cuff-links. All he owns now is a watch that he never wears.

He eats like a wolf, drinks two quarts of milk a day and cream when he can get it, but doesn't gain weight. He likes pie for breakfast, and the only thing he hates worse than cabbage is gossip.

He's in Florida at the moment, on location for "Thirty Seconds Over Tokyo." Their friends can't down the hope that whatever went wrong between him and Miss Jones may yet be mended somehow by them. They want boy and girl together again, under the sign of a blue hat with white ribbons. See here, Mr. Walker, that's not mere idle gossip. That's just the good old American prayer for a happy ending to stories of youth and love and dreams.

points and high light your good ones.

Suppose, for example, that yours is a round, fullblown sort of face. What to do? Simply wear your hair high on top and close to the side. Steer clear of fussy, fancy or frilly entanglements. Any upswept, sleek, sculptured coif is safe.

Perhaps you want to soften a long face. Wear your hair full above the ears and avoid stiff, evenly balanced lines. Try softly irregular, slanting lines like side parts and loose waves.

How now, you demand of ye Beauty Ed., to achieve this dazzling coif, once decided upon? A good first step is to comb a wave set through your hair while it is still damp (but not wringing wet).

To achieve pin curls, begin at your part, separating your hair into triangular sections about a half-inch wide. Comb each strand out smoothly, place your finger halfway up its length (you are holding it straight out from your head), then stretch and wind it, not too tightly, around your finger. Pull the ringlet off with the thumb and finger of your other hand and roll it down to your head. Next, anchor the curl with two hairpins or bob pins, one from each side, letting them cross in the hollow center. When this handiwork atop your head is dry, comb each ringlet out carefully and glamorize it with brilliantine. If you hanker for the sleek effect, spray your hair with lacquer to hold each strand in place as part of one smooth surface.

Speaking of men as our title does, married femmes should remember that a colorful bandanna or snood hides a multitude of sins. Don't forego your at-home fixin' just because you don't want the old man to see you in curlers. Incidentally, all of you, married gals and spinsters, follow these Hollywood hair-cues, and your pet man will notice your bright curls. We promise it!
